On the 10th of January, during the visit of the Prince of Orange to the Emperor Napoleon, his Majesty ordered a review, in honour of his guest, of the troops of the Imperial Guard in garrison at Paris in the courtyard of the Tuileries. The troops, which comprised also a Line regiment, were formed in battle order in eight lines, and consisted of two battalions of Gendarmerie, two battalions of Zouaves, three battalions of Grenadiers, a battalion of Chasseurs à Pied, three battalions of Voltigeurs, and two battalions of the Line. On the Place du Carrousel, outside the Palace railing, were drawn up four batteries of Artillery and five squadrons of Horse Chasseurs. Most of the officers were upon their breasts the Italian medal, and many that commemorative of the Crimean campaign. The battalion of Chasseurs à Pied which took an Austrian battery in such gallant style at the battle of Solferino was much remarked by the persons present.

At one o'clock the beating of the drums announced the arrival of the Emper r, who was accompanied by the Prince of Orange and a brilliant cortége of military officers, amongst whom we noticed Marshal Randon, the Minister of War; Marshal Regnault de Saint Jean d'Angely, Commander-in-Chief of the Imperial Guard; Marshal Magnan, Commander-in-Chief of the 1st Army Corps; and several Generals. The Prince of Orange was on the right of the Emperor, and wore the grand cordon of the Legion of Honour.

Whilst the Emperor, accompanied by the Dutch Prince, was passing in front of the lines, the little Prince Imperial was seen with the 1st Grenadiers, of which regiment he is inscribed as corporal. His Imperial Highness, on a small pony, and having a squire by his side, wore the uniform of his regiment. Shortly after, the Empress Eugénie, surrounded by her ladies of honour, came down to the foot of the staircase to receive the petit caporal, who got off his pony to go and greet his august mother. The Emperor and the Prince having terminated the review, the defile commenced: his Majesty took up a position in front of the principal pavilion, having on his right the Prince of Orange and on his left the Prince Imperial, who had remounted his pony.

The scene shown in our Engraving represents the defile at the time of the passing of the Chasseurs à Cheval on their beautiful Arabian horses before the illustrious spectators. All the troops went off in admirable order, and regained their quarters by the large entrance to the courtyard of the Tuileries leading to the quay, as shown in our Illustration, which is due to the clever pencil of M. Beaucé.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The Derby betting has been creating a sensation during the week. Mainstone is at last in the same proud position at the Corner (10 to 1, taken freely) as his noble owner is in Downing-street; Umpire and Thormanby have been shaky; Buccaneer has unexpectedly thrown out signals of distress, though, we believe, without any assignable cause; and Nutbourne has quite beaten a retreat. The racing season commences on Wednesday at Lincoln, for whose leading handicap Curlew has received very strong support. For its Grand Steeplechase there are twenty acceptances out of twenty-five entries; and Trumpeter, 8st. 7lb., heads the fifty-three Northamptonshire Stakes acceptances.

The death of Birdcatcher is reported, and that of Charles XII. is formally announced. Although the first two or three lots of yearlings by the "nut-brown crack of '39," which came up to Doncaster for sale in the autumn, created quite a furore by their handsome looks, they did not stand the test, and their sire has long since ceased to hold any stud rank. He was a very uncertain horse, and very difficult to keep in form. Goodwood was the scene of some of his best victories, and the first cup he won there in 1841 was the means of bringing the late Job Marson, then a comparatively unknown man of four-and-twenty, prominently before the racing world. Several of his hunters were good, and Phœbe, which John Walker, the celebrated huntsman of the Wynnstay, rode for eight seasons, proved herself especially so. The vicissitudes of a thoroughbred horse are strangely pointed out by the Mark-lane Express in the case of Caledon. He won the head prize of £50 at the Londonderry meeting, and, after gaining some twenty more, was raffled at Preston for £150. The lucky drawer rode him twelve miles, but his triumph was short-lived, as his gallant chestnut fell dead lame, and he was glad to bring him back next morning to Preston Fair, and sell him for fifty.

Three more days of capital sport have to be added to our already rich diary of sport with Earl Stamford's hounds. On Monday, January 30, they had a good hunting run of an hour and twenty minutes, from Cream Gorse up to Saxelby Wood (crossing the river near Frisby), where the hounds were stopped, very few attempting to follow them on account of the frost. In the afternoon they had a capital gallop for forty minutes from Thorp Trussels down to the Marfield Brook, and a ring back to Ashby Pastures, where the fox was lost.—Tuesday, Jan. 31. The meet, Donnington Park, in which a fox was killed. Found another in the Breedon Woods, and ran him to ground in a drain, after a sharp ten minutes. They bolted him, and had forty minutes without a check and, lost him in a plantation near the monastery in the forest. The pace was tremendous. — Saturday, February 4, Bradgate House—Found in an osier-bed near Groby Pool, and, after running by Anstey, Beaumont Leys, the Abbey at Leicester, Braunston, Kirby Muxloe, Frith, Glenfield, Groby, and through Bradgate Park and Swithland Wood, the fox was viewed, dead beat, on a rock amongst the old Slate Pits. The hounds dashing at him, he leaped from the rock down the pit, forty or fifty feet, into the water, and was drowned. Fortunately the hounds stopped on the edge of the rock, or nothing could have saved them. As the fox did not sink he was got out, a boat being on the water, and given to the hounds. This is certainly the finest run Lord Stamford's hounds have had this season—the distance nineteen miles; time, two hours fifteen minutes, over a very fine country, and as stout a fox as ever ran before hounds.

"Oxon" gives a very spirited account in the Life of the Prince of Wales's first appearance with the South Oxfordshire. We believe that he rode his celebrated bay horse Comus, which his old riding-tutor, Mr. Davis, has handled in so many good runs with the Queen's this season. The Heythrop had three successive days of most wonderful sport, about the beginning of the month. The Tackley, run on Feb. 1, was 1h. 37m. without a check, and as good a run as they have had this season, bar none. It was, for the most part, in Mr. Drake's country, and over a very fine line. With reference to our remarks on the Cheshire sport last week a correspondent writes:—"The fact is, it is the huntsman who is overridden, and not the hounds."

The first of the Sunbeam winners has come out in Creeper (a fawn daughter of Mr. Jebb's No Hurry), at the Baron Hill Meeting, where she won the principal stake. The Newmarket Champion on Tuesday, &c.; Hordley on Wednesday; Spelthorne Club on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday; and Dirleton and County Louth Club on Thursday, are the fixtures for next week; and then comes the all-absorbing Waterloo Cup.

A dividend of £5 5s. per cent per annum was declared at the half-yearly meeting of the London and South-Western Railway Company held on Thursday last.

It is stated that Mr. Cross, one of the members for Preston, who has resigned his practice at the Bar in order to take part in the management of a bank at Warrington, intends to vacate his seat in Parliament, owing to the claims upon his time and attention arising from business.

A memorial has been placed over the remains of Lady Morgan in the Brompton Cemetery. It consists of a flat slab, supported by six pillars; below is a block of polished white marble, on which is inscribed "Sydney Lady Morgan," and the date of her death in April last.

The officers and workmen of the Great Western Railway Company's carriage department have presented to Mr. John Gibson, the superintendent of that department, an elaborate silver tea and coffee service, value £110, as a mark of their high esteem and appreciation of his unremitting attention to the welfare of all persons serving under him.

An overland route for telegraphic communication with America has been proposed in France, making use of the existing lines from London to Dresden, and thence entering the Russian empire, and passing through Moscow and Kasan. Then crossing the Ural Mountains to Yakoutsk and on to the Behring Strait, crossing this, and passing through Russian America to Canada and the United States.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Although the withdrawals of gold from the Bank of England for export purposes have been under £20,000, considerable flatness has prevailed in the English Stock Market during the week, but without leading to any important change in prices. The settlement in Consols has, to some extent, interfered with speculative operations, and any increase in them can hardly be anticipated until after the delivery of the Government financial statement in the House of Commons.

There has been a steady, though not to say very active, demand for money in the general discount market. Although the supply of capital is still very large, great caution has been shown on the part of the discount houses in making advances except for short periods. In Lombard-street no money can be obtained under the Bank's minimum—viz., 4 per cent. A few four months' bills have been negotiated at 4½ to 4¾, and six months' at 5 to 5¼ per cent. In the Stock Exchange the rate for advances on Government securities for short periods is 3 to 3½ per cent.

In some of the Foreign Exchanges there has been a slight improvement, and we learn that the latest quotation at St. Petersburg on London had declined from 35⅝d. to 35⅛d. The latter figure may lead to a renewal of gold exports.

The total imports of bullion have been under £300,000. The gold at hand has been disposed of for France; and the silver market is steady, at 62⅝d. for Mexican dollars. The supply of silver on offer is very limited.

A return just issued states that the total quanity of rupee paper received from India to the end of last year was £4,098,657.

The Canadian Government have invested £1,300,000 of the new loan in Indian Five per Cent Stock of 1859, in accordance, it is presumed, with the wishes of the Imperial Government, as security for the sinking fund of the Old Canada Guaranteed Loan.

A meeting of the Australian Royal Mail Company has been held, when it was announced that about half the paid-up capital will eventually be returned to the shareholders. A dividend of 2s. 6d. per share will be declared at the next meeting of the English and Australian Copper Company. A dividend, at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, has been declared by the Electric Telegraph Company, and £1 per share by the Screw Collier Company.

The market for Indian paper has been tolerably firm; but the dealings in the newly-formed companies' scrip have been limited:—St. Paulo Railway, ¼ ⅛ dis.; Ocean Marine, 2½ ¾ prem.; Universal, 9-16 to 11-16 prem.; Bank of Turkey, par; and New Canadian Loan, 2¼ prem. The Exchequer-bill market has considerably improved.

On Monday prices of Home Stocks had a drooping tendency, and the market, almost generally, was flat:—The Reduced left off at 94¾ ⅞; Consols, for Money, 94½ ⅝; New Three per Cents, 94¾ ⅞; Consols for Account, 94¾ ½; India Stock, 217; Ditto Five per Cents, 103⅛ ⅜; Ditto enfaced paper, Five per Cent, 98⅛ ¼; Ditto, Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104; Ditto Debentures, 1858, 97½; Ditto, 1859, 97¾ ⅜; Ditto Bonds, 4s. prem.; Exchequer Bills, 21s. to 25s. prem. The quotations were again easier on the following day, and the purchases of stock were trifling:—Bank Stock marked 229; the Reduced and the New Three per Cents sold at 94⅝ ¼ ⅜; Consols, for Transfer, 94⅝ ½ ⅜; New Three per Cents, 94¾ ½ ⅝; New Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 78½ ¾; Long Annuities, 1885, 17⅞ ¾; India Five per Cents, 103⅛ ¼ 102⅞ ¾ 103; Ditto Debentures, 97¼ ½; Ditto Bonds, 2s. dis. 3s. prem.; Exchequer Bills, 22s. to 25s. prem.; India Enfaced Paper, Five per Cent, was done at 98⅜; and the Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104⅛. The fluctuations on Wednesday were unimportant; but the market was certainly heavy. Bank Stock closed at 229; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 94⅝ ⅜; Consols, 94⅜ ¼; Long Annuities, 1885, 17⅞; India Stock, 220; Ditto Five per Cents, 103; Ditto Enfaced Paper, Five per Cent, 98⅛; Ditto, Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104⅛; Ditto Debentures, 97½; Ditto Bonds, 3s. prem.; Exchequer Bills, 23s. prem. On Thursday Home Stocks were somewhat heavy. Consols, for Money, were done at 94⅛ ¼; for the Account, 94¼ ⅜; the Reduced and the New Three per Cents, 94¼ ⅜; Long Annuities, 17¾ ⅞; India Debentures, 97¼ ½; Exchequer Bills, 23s. to 26s. prem.; India Loan was 102¾ ⅞; and the Five per Cent Enfaced Paper, 98.

In the Foreign House the dealings have, generally speaking, been on a very moderate scale; nevertheless, as scarcely any forced sales of stock have been made, no change has taken place in prices. The leading quotations for the week are as follows:—Brazilian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1852, 93¾; Ditto, 1858, 93¾; Equador New Consolidated, 13⅜; Belgian Four-and-Half per Cents, 99½; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 66⅛; Dutch Four per Cents, 102½; Grenada Three-and-a-Half per Cents, New Deferred, 15⅜; Mexican Three per Cents, 21⅛; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 94; Portuguese Three per Cents, 44; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 98; Russian Three per Cents, 65½; Sardinian Five per Cents, 85; Spanish Three per Cents, 44¼; Ditto, New Deferred, 33½; Ditto, Passive, 11¼; Turkish Six per Cents, 78¾; Ditto, New, 65⅝; Venezuela Three per Cents, 26½.

The transactions in Joint-stock Bank Shares have been to a moderate extent, and the quotations, generally, have been supported. Australasia have realised 80¾; Bank of Egypt, 24½; Chartered of India, Australia, and China, 20½; City, 65⅛; English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered, 16¼ ex div.; London Chartered of Australia, 22½; London and County, 34; London Joint-stock, 31; London and Westminster, 55; National, 61½; National Provincial of England, 80½; Ditto, New, 23¼; Oriental, 40¼; Ottoman, 19½; Provincial of Ireland, New, 30; Union of Australia, 46¼; and Union of London, 28 ex div.

The Miscellaneous Market continues very quiet. English and Australian Copper have sold at 2¼; Great Ship, ½; Madras Irrigation and Canal, 3; National Discount, 4 ex div.; North British Australasian, ⅞ ex div.; Peel River Land and Mineral, 51; Red Sea and India Telegraph, 15⅜; Rhymney Iron, 22⅞; Royal Mail Steam, 52⅝; Scottish Australian Investment, 120; Van Diemen's Land, 11½; East and West India Docks, 117; London, 70; Birmingham Canal, 96; Leeds and Liverpool, 515; Regent's, 18; Chelsea Waterworks, New Guaranteed, 1862, 24½ ex div.; Lambeth, 99 ex. div.

The amount of business transacted in the Railway Share Market has been only moderate. In the early part of the week prices were rather drooping, but since then they have showed signs of firmness. The dividend of the Great Western is announced at 3½; the Midland 3 upon the Consolidated Stock; the Great Southern and Western, 5; London and Blackwall, 4; North Staffordshire, 4; and the Lancashire and Yorkshire at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. Annexed are Thursday's official closing quotations:—

THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange, Feb. 6.—Only a limited supply of English wheat was on offer in to-day's market; but there was a decided improvement in the general quality of the samples. On the whole, there was more firmness in the demand, and last week's currency was well supported. Foreign wheat—the show of which was tolerably extensive—met a slow inquiry; nevertheless, prices ruled somewhat firm. In floating cargoes the transactions were on a limited scale. There was a good consumptive inquiry for all kinds of barley, and, in some instances, malting parcels were the turn higher. New malt was firm in price; but old parcels were very dull. Oats—the supply of which was rather limited—commanded extreme rates; whilst both beans and peas were the turn against buyers. The flour trade was somewhat steady, at full quotations.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 37s. to 46s.; ditto, white, 40s. to 52s.; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 37s. to 46s.; rye, 28s. to 31s.; grinding barley, 26s. to 28s.; distilling ditto, 28s. to 30s.; malting ditto, 33s. to 46s.; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 63s. to 66s.; brown ditto, 48s. to 49s.; Kingston and Ware, 54s. to 68s.; Chevalier, 67s. to 71s.; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 21s. to 26s.; potato ditto, 26s. to 30s.; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s. to 21s.; ditto, white, 20s. to 27s.; tick beans, 33s. to 36s.; grey peas, 33s. to 35s.; maple, 37s. to 40s.; white, 36s. to 78s.; boilers, 38s. to 40s. per quarter. Town-made flour, 41s. to 43s.; town households, 36s. to 37s.; country marks, 30s. to 36s. per 280 lb.; American, 23s. to 27s. per barrel; French, 29s. to 36s. per sack.

Feb. 8.—For nearly all kinds of produce there was a fair demand to-day, and Monday's prices were well supported.

Seeds.—The transactions in our market continue on a very moderate scale, as follows:—

Linseed, English, crushing, 48s. to 54s.; Calcutta, 48s. to 49s.; hempseed, 35s. to 36s. per quarter; coriander, 15s. to 18s. per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 12s. to 14s.; ditto, white, 15s. to 16s.; tares, 7s. to 7s. 6d. per bushel. English rapeseed, 50s. to 60s. per quarter; linseed cakes, English, £9 10s. to £10 0s.; ditto, foreign, £9 10s. to £10 15s.; rape cakes, £5 10s. to £6 0s. per ton; canary, 58s. to 62s. per quarter; red clover seed, 46s. to 66s. white ditto, 84s. to 92s. per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d. to 7½d.; of household ditto, 5d. to 6½d. per 4-lb. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 43s. 8d.; barley, 34s. 10d.; oats, 21s. 0d.; rye, 31s. 0d.; beans, 38s. 1d.; peas, 35s. 4d.

The Six Weeks' Averages.—Wheat, 43s. 11d.; barley, 34s. 7d.; oats 21s. 4d.; rye, 32s. 10d.; beans, 38s. 8d.; peas, 36s. 9d.

English Grain Sold last Week.—Wheat, 103,857; barley, 85,406; oats, 15,649; rye, 93; beans, 5572; peas, 1970 quarters.

Tea.—The public sales held this week have gone off slowly, yet very little change has taken place in prices. Privately, common sound Congou is worth 1s. 5½d. to 1s. 5¾d. per lb. The show of samples is only moderate.

Sugar.—Only limited quantities of raw sugar have been offered and disposed of since our last report. Prices, however, are supported. Refined goods move off slowly, at 51s. to 51s. 6d. per cwt. for common brown lumps. In crushed sugars very little is passing.

Coffee.—We have no change to notice in the value of any kind, but the demand generally is in a healthy state.

Rice.—The demand is heavy, and to force sales lower prices must be submitted to.

Provisions.—There is a moderate inquiry for Irish butter, at about previous currencies. Limerick is selling at 106s. to 112s.; Carlow, 110s. to 120s.; Cork, 100s. to 124s.; Tralee, 10ls to 110s. per cwt. Both English and foreign parcels rule about stationary. The bacon market is inactive. Waterford sizeable is quoted at 61s. to 63s.; oversized, 56s. to 60s. per cwt. Bladdered lard, 60s. to 72s.; keg, 58s. to 64s. per cwt. Eggs are still dear. English, 10s. to 12s.; French, 9s. to 10s. per 120.

Tallow.—The demand is steady, and P.Y.C., on the spot, is selling at 60s. 6d., and for the last three months, 53s. 9d., per cwt.

Oils.—Linseed oil is firm, at 27s. 6d. to 27s. 9d. per cwt. on the spot. Most other oils support last week's currency. Spirits of turpentine, 35s. 6d. to 36s. per cwt.

Spirits.—We have again to report a dull inquiry for rum, at barely stationary prices. Proof Leewards, 1s. 8d. to 1s. 10d. per gallon. Brandy is in request, at fully the late advance in the quotations. No change in the value of grain spirits.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £2 10s. to £4 4s.; clover ditto, £3 10s. to £5 5s.; and straw, £1 4s. to £1 9s. per load. A fair demand.

Coals.—Best house coals, 20s. 6d. to 21s.; seconds, 13s. 9d. to 14s. 9d.; Hartley's, 13s. 9d. to 14s. 9d.; and manufacturers', 13s. 3d. to 14s. 9d. per ton.

Hops.—All new hops continue in good request, at fully the late advance in prices.

Wool.—Our market is very flat, and the quotations are a shade lower.

Potatoes.—The supplies are moderate, and the trade is steady, at from 80s. to 145s. per ton.

Metropolitan Cattle Market (Thursday, Feb. 9).—Notwithstanding that the supply of beasts in to-day's market was rather limited, all kinds met a slow sale, at Monday's currency. We have to report a very inactive demand for sheep—the show of which was very moderate—at late quotations. The best old Downs sold at 5s. 6d. per 8lb. Calves came slowly to hand; nevertheless, the veal trade was in a sluggish state, on former terms. Pigs were very dull, and there was scarcely and demand for milch cows. Per 8lb. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s. 4d. to 3s. 6d.; second quality ditto, 3s. 8d. to 4s. 2d.; prime large oxen, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 8d.; prime Scots, &c., 4s. 8d. to 4s. 10d.; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s. 8d. to 4s. 2d.; second quality ditto, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 8d.; prime coarse-woolled sheep, 4s. 10d. to 5s. 2d.; prime Southdown ditto, 5s. 4d. to 5s. 6d.; large coarse calves, 4s. 10d. to 5s. 4d.; prime small ditto, 5s. 6d. to 5s. 8d.; large hogs, 3s. 6d. to 3s. 10d.; neat small porkers, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 10d.; suckling calves, 19s. to 22s.; and quarter old store pigs, 23s. to 29s. each. Total supply: Beasts, 922; cows, 130; sheep, 2930; calves, 120; pigs, 212. Foreign: Beasts, 120; sheep, 500; calves, 70.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—The supplies of meat are moderate, and the demand rules steady:—Beef, from 2s. 6d. to 4s. 4d.; mutton, 3s. 0d. to 4s. 6d.; veal, 4s. 0d. to 4s. 8d.; pork, 3s. 10d. to 5s. 0d. per 8lb. by the carcass.

NOTICE.—In consequence of Messrs. Lawes and Morton having just commenced 1860 with opposition similar to that which they previously advanced, and wishing to do those gentlemen every justice, Mr THORLEY is induced to ENLARGE his coming PAMPHLET, making it 64 pages instead of 32—showing beyond doubt that their observations on the so-called "Concentrated Cattle Food," and so-called "Feeding Statistics," are without foundation; that the Rothamsted experiment was not made with his Food, and consequently that this complete failure must either be through mismanagement or from buying the condiment at a wrong shop.
The first impression of One Hundred Thousand Copies will be ready about the first day of March, and may be had post-free, on receipt of Three Stamps, on application to Joseph Thorley, the Inventor and sole proprietor of "Thorley's Food for Cattle," 77, Newgate-street, London; 21, Broadway New York, United States; Mr. J. W. Thorley, Melbourne, Victoria; Mr. Alfred Burt, Sydney, New South Wales; and of all his agents throughout the United kingdom.

THE INUNDATIONS IN NORMANDY.—THE CHATEAU DE FALAISE.

THE recent inundations of the fruitful Norman districts not only invaded a portion of the fine pasturages for which this part of France is celebrated, but also the thoroughfares of some of its principal cities. Caen, Bayeux, Vire, Lisieux, Pont l'Evêque, Evreux, &c., have each and all had their streets transformed into little navigable rivers and their public places converted into lakes. Fortunately no serious accident to life has occurred through the rising of the waters; but the material loss to property is considerable.

The town of Falaise, which is not at all accustomed to inundations, has, however, had its little River Ante overflowed, and during nine days the lower streets of the Faubourg of the Valley of the Ante, as it is called, were filled with water. This miniature inundation gave a singular aspect to the picturesque streets of this quarter, which are surmounted by the imposing mass of the old donjon of William the Conqueror, of which we give an Engraving, as it recently appeared.

The Château of Falaise is the most remarkable building in the district, and owes its name most probably to the dominating position it occupies, the word falaise being generally used in the sense of rock. Its construction is attributed to the time of Julius Cæsar, and it was one of the most formidable strongholds in feudal times. The château is to the west of the city, and built upon rocks which border the current of the little River Ante. Its form is almost that of an oblong square, and its principal entrance faces the town. There were formerly a number of subterranean entrances on the north, south, and west; but they have disappeared. The ramparts have an elevation of from fifteen to forty feet, and are established immediately on the rock, as indeed is the rest of the town. So strong was the position in former times that nothing short of hunger could have forced its defenders to surrender. The principal parts of the fortress consisted of an old square donjon, considered by some archæologists as the work of the Romans, and of a high and magnificent tower, which still exist.

What renders this château particularly interesting to Englishmen is the circumstance that William the Conqueror was born here. It was in the room in the tower on the right in our Illustration, the window of which is surmounted by a Roman arch, that the son of Duke Robert, the first Norman King of England, was born. This relic of past ages is fast falling to decay; but we hope that some steps may be taken in time to preserve a building to which so many historical recollections are attached.

THE LATE INUNDATIONS IN NORMANDY.—THE CHATEAU DE FALAISE.

FALL OF THE PEMBERTON MILLS, AT LAWRENCE, MASSACHUSETTS.

IN our Journal of the 28th of January we gave the details of a terrible accident which occurred on the afternoon of the 10th of January at Lawrence, a manufacturing town in Massachusetts United States—the fall of the Pemberton Mills, in which about seven hundred persons were at work, nearly all of whom were buried in the ruins. On the preceding page we give an Engraving of the ruins of Pemberton Mills, and annexed are some particulars of the shocking catastrophe from an American Journal:—

"At about ten minutes past five o'clock on Tuesday evening, January 10, the Pemberton Mills, at Lawrence, Mass., literally crumbled to the earth—roof, walls, machinery, everything—human souls and all, lay mingled up in an inextricable mass—bricks cemented by blood, iron seating into warm, quivering limbs. Not a moment's warning was given, no foreshadowing of the fearful doom impending to the seven or eight hundred men and women peacefully pursuing their daily avocations. A single crash, and ruin overwhelmed them all.

"The first alarm to the citizens of Lawrence was the report of fire at the Pemberton Mills. This produced great excitement, but the after knowledge of the extent of the catastrophe seemed to paralyse every one. But active sympathy was soon developed, and thousands of earnest, energetic men thronged to the spot and began the dangerous work of attempting to extricate the buried factory people from the mass of ruins, which were spread over two acres of ground. During the whole of the night from two to three thousand men were engaged in the work, and it is reported that many of them fell victims to their generous but misdirected efforts in the cause of humanity. Huge bonfires were lighted all around the ruins to light the labourers in their work, and a scene of more thrilling, fearful interest can hardly be imagined, and was never described. The shrieks of the buried and mangled creatures were harrowing and heartending, and were re-echoed from the thousands of bystanders, most of whom had dear relatives or friends, helpless and perhaps dying, within hearing, but almost beyond the reach of help. As early as nine p.m. nineteen persons dangerously wounded had been conveyed to the City Hall, which had been fitted up as a temporary hospital to receive the dead and wounded. But scores of the sufferers had also been recognised by their friends and conveyed to their homes, while twenty-two were taken from the ruins—dead.

"It was thought at nine o'clock p.m. that nothing could add to the horror of the sights and sounds about them, but in half an hour the terrible cry of 'Fire!' was heard, and in a moment the fearful fact became apparent. Smoke and flames were seen issuing from the ruins, and those who had hoped before now yielded to despair, for those within the crushing ruins had spared no effort until immediate. Many engines were on the spot, and streams of water were immediately brought to bear upon the ruins. The firemen worked nobly, and there were thousands ready and eager to help them. At first the fire seemed to make no way, and there was a reasonable hope that it would be immediately subdued; but soon, in spite of every effort, the flames began to spread with steady but irresistible force, until the whole mass of ruins was enveloped in a sheet which charred to ashes at once the crushed fragments of the building, and the mangled, screaming sufferers buried beneath.

An inquest has been held, and from the evidence of several witnesses there appears to be no doubt that the accident was owing to the thinness and weakness of the outside walls of that unusually large number of windows. According to the latest despatches 115 were killed or missing, and 165 injured. The principal owners of the mill were Mr. Howe and Mr. Nevius, of Boston, both of whom were in it several times on the day of the accident. Workmen have been employed night and day at the ruins since the accident, bringing fresh bodies daily, some so frightfully mutilated as not to be recognised. Nothing of the mill remains standing but two tall chimneys. Subscriptions in aid of the sufferers are being raised throughout the United States and Canada.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

GENERAL SIR THOMAS MARDOUGALL BRISBANE, BART.

GENERAL SIR THOMAS MARDOUGALL BRISBANE, Bart., of Brisbane, in the county of Ayr, G.C.B., G.C.H., LL.D., F.R.S., Colonel of the 34th Foot, and Knight of the distinguished military officer, and the oldest in the army, was the son and heir of the late Thomas Brisbane, Esq., of Brisbane, by his wife, Eleanor, daughter of Sir Michael Bruce, Bart., of Stenhouse, and was the chief and representative of the Brisbanes of Brisbane, a very ancient and honourable family in Ayrshire. He was born at Brisbane, Ayrshire, in 1773, and entered the British Army in 1790. He served in all the campaigns in Flanders, and was with Sir Ralph Abercromby in the West Indies. He commanded a brigade in the Peninsula, and shared in the glory of most of the Peninsular battles, being, in fact, present in no less than twenty-three general actions or battles. He had a severe and one sharp for Vittoria, Pyrenees, Nivelle, Orthes, and Toulouse. He received the honour of Knighthood for his gallant conduct. He was, from 1826 to 1828, Governor of New South Wales. He was made a G.C.B. in 1831, and was created a Baronet in 1836. He became a G.C.B. in 1837, and a General on the 23rd of November, 1841. He had obtained the Colonelcy of the 34th Foot on the 14th of December, 1846. Sir Thomas was not only a gallant and efficient soldier, but also won fame in the peaceful pursuits of learning and science, and was devoted to the study of astronomy. He erected two famous astronomical observatories—one at Parramatta, during his government of New South Wales, and the other on his estate of Mackerstoun, in Roxburghshire. He wrote some able essays on astronomy. He also contributed to the Royal Society's Transactions for private circulation. He was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society in 1819, and obtained their astronomical medal in 1823, 1824, and 1825. He was a D.C.L. of Oxford, and was President of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, being in that capacity the successor of Sir Walter Scott. Sir Thomas was married, in November, 1819, Anna Maria, daughter of Sir Henry Hay Mackenzie, Bart., of Newhall, and had issue two sons and six daughters, of whom five survive, and has been unmarried before him. In 1835 Sir Thomas and his wife were honoured by sign-manual in the title and precedence of Mardougall. Sir Thomas died on the 27th ult., at his seat, Brisbane, Ayrshire; and, as he leaves no children, his baronetcy becomes extinct.

LADY CHARLOTTE PROLY.

LADY Charlotte Proly, whose awfully sudden death occurred on the 23rd ult., while on a visit to the Dowager Lady Wenlock, at 29, Berkeley-square, was the second daughter of the late Lord Lyndoch, first Earl of Carysfort, and his eldest daughter by his second wife, Elizabeth, second daughter of the Right Hon. George Grenville, and sister of Richard, the late Marquis of Buckingham. Lady Charlotte Proly was born on the 16th of February, 1785. She was never married, and was the last survivor of her sisters, the only one now surviving is the present venerable Earl of Carysfort.

THE DOWAGER LADY LEIGH.

THE Right Hon. Margaret, Dowager Lady Leigh, whose lamented death occurred at the family mansion, 37, Portman-square, on the 5th inst., was the eldest daughter of the late Rev. William Bromley Davenport, of Capesthorne House, Northamptonshire, Prebendary of York, and was the granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bromley Davenport, and the great-granddaughter of Sir John Justice Sir John Willes. She was born in 1788, and married, on the 30th of June, 1813, to Chandos Leigh, Esq., of Stoneleigh Abbey, Warwickshire, created Lord Leigh of Stoneleigh, in 1839, a peer who obtained a reputation as a wit, but died on the 17th of September, 1850. Lady Leigh survives her husband rather more than nine years, and leaves by him a family of ten children—three sons and seven daughters. The eldest son, Lieutenant-Colonel Leigh; the Hon. E. Chandos Leigh; and the Hon. James Wentworth Leigh; and seven daughters, of whom four are married—viz., Lady Mary, wife of the Right Hon. C. B. Adderley, M.P.; Caroline, wife of the present Right Hon. and Rev. Lord Sey and Sele; Lady Margaret Mary, wife of the Rev. and Hon. H. Cholmondeley.

WILLIAM DUFTON, ESQ., F.R.C.S.

WILLIAM DUFTON, Esq., a gentleman of the highest medical reputation, whose death has just occurred, was a native of Westmoreland, and of an ancient family, being a younger son of the late John Dufton, Esq., of Bridgend. He commenced his professional career as a pupil and assistant of the Messrs. Dickenson, long known as first-rate practitioners at Worksington. He afterwards studied at the Borough Hospital, and in Great Windmill-street Hospital, Dublin, where he particularly attached himself to that excellent surgeon, Mr. Kirby, who was also the friend and medical adviser of the welfare of Mr. Dufton. He entered upon practice in Birmingham in 1830, and speedily met with great success. From the beginning he was one of the few persons to have attended specially to diseases of the ear, and in 1834 published a work on that subject, which was highly valued at the time, and has since been praised by the leading medical journals and was very popular. He then established a practice for the Relief of Deafness, which was the first of the kind in medical officer. Its prosperity was complete, and it has been the means of extending relief to thousands of sufferers. Mr. Dufton soon became the chief consulting practitioner in the midland district and the north, for these disorders, and was beginning to reap the fruits of great industry and talent when death terminated his useful career. The private character of the gentleman deceased merited all the esteem and regard which were bestowed with his public worth. The words of that learned divine, the Rev. J. R. Mawdsley, in describing his funeral sermon, were by no means exaggeration:—"His patients saw not only professional skill, but high integrity, honour, kindness of heart, affability, and a large share of Christian prudence. The town of Birmingham feels and laments his loss: he was a public benefactor. His large means—nearly, upright, disinterested—have won the hearts of all acquainted with him."

CAPTAIN MOORSOM.

CAPTAIN Moorsom died on the 4th inst. at his brother's house at Brighton. He had resigned the command of the Diadem steam-frigate only a few days before, and was not altogether unexpected, though very sudden, arising from the rupture of one of the vessels of the heart. He was attacked with it within a few days of his first visit to Dover. He entered the Navy when fourteen. Although he obtained the rank of Captain in 1847, he was not made Lieutenant until seven years after he had served his full time as mate. The invention of the "Moorsom" brought him into notice. He served in the Chinese war, and soon after the breaking out of that with Russia, being then a Post-Captain, he was appointed to the Firebrand, whose commander had been killed at the mouth of the Danube. He never joined that ship, but was employed on shore, with Captains Lushington, Keppel, Peel, and Hay, in the Naval Brigade. He had a large share in the organisation of that force, and was the only Captain who served with one complete, who served with it through all the bombardments until it was broken up at the fall of Sebastopol. Captain Moorsom was made a C.B., a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, and had the Order of the Medjidie, together with, of course, the Chinese, Crimean, and Turkish medals. He gave his invention of the "shell," or, more properly, "percussion fuse," to the Government, and it has been for some years adopted in the service. He wrote a treatise on the "Manœuvring of Steam Fleets."

FINE ARTS.

THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

THE exhibition at the British Institution, just opened, is, upon the whole, an agreeable though a provoking display. Comprising a full supply of works of fair ordinary merit, in every variety of style, it does not present any one production which may be singled out and pointed to as being of pre-eminent merit. The gallery has always been looked upon as neutral ground, where the magnates of art and the humblest beginner might meet on equal terms, according to their merits. In this the magnates have not on the present occasion, and they can hardly be said to have put forth all their strength, or exhibited their best pictures, or even those most characteristic by them. On the other hand, the names of those who just skim above the level of mediocrity are legion, and they certainly have spared neither trouble nor paint to appear to the best advantage.

As we propose on a future occasion speaking in some detail of all the works of merit of any sort in this collection, we shall now merely selves to a brief and cursory review of those which are of prominent interest. The place of honour under the direction is undoubtedly a really fine picture—fine in conception, and highly satisfactory in execution—by J. R. Swinton: (1) "Britomartis—a lady-knight, in whom Britain glorifies," as spoken of in the introduction to Spenser's "Faery Queene." The mixed character of feminine delicacy and heroic valour implied by the subject has been appreciated with no ordinary success. Beneath this picture is a small view, of curiously rather smallly treated "The Needle Rocks, near Howth, Dublin" (3), by E. Hayes, A.R.A. Here we find Dickens to make us smile at two clever-enough child-studies (3). Lovell and Holland (4) have the introduction of a splendacle as all the splendour of newness and the pride of salient nose; the latter showing to the more advantage "Greeting" with the last named two prominent feature rudely detached from its place, and displayed in the hand of the disconsolate little girl who owns the once wondrous nose.

G. Cruikshank displays considerable dramatic humour in his little scene "A Night Adventure in Rathbone Place. Smoking Pipe in England," whilst his servant, supposing his master to be on fire, is preparing to throw a pitcher of water upon him. Pug will have a word to say to the same artist's "Queen Mab" (511), in which he attempts to realise, on solid canvas, in solid matter-of-fact paint, the poet's fanciful vision of the wicked little fairy:

> Drawn with a team of little atomies
> Athwart men's noses as they lie asleep.

What indeed! Well, there is the sleeping man's face, though more like a mask, and his nose—no trifle in its way—and what seems to be a light cart and horses, but nothing else.

Passing by a group of "Prawnishers" (47), by W. Underhill, credible enough, and the artist's contribution to the more interesting landscape, by Jutsum, "Norbury" (53), a verdant calm retreat—

> By the soft windings of the gentle Mole.

L. Haghe has a fine church interior—"St. Gomar, at Lierre, Belgium" (57); "St. Jacques, Antwerp" (87); and "St. Miniato, Florence" (91)—with processions and other appropriate groups of figures, all painted with a proper regard for effect, and with the amount of care and finish the subjects required. Niemann, also, has a fine church interior (59), with tombstone, "To the Forbidden—Richmond in the Dufance" (91) is most to our liking; but has again become in sad error with the artist's usual habit of the London season was a little too early for the landscape artist.

Ansdell still adheres to his newly-adopted Spanish subjects, and his "Spanish Gipsies" (60) is one of the best of the series that the reputation he has actually acquired in this line—and it was hardly necessary that he should have attempted to sustain it. It is not merely as a painter of animals, but of character also, that he now stands before us, and in a way that shows he has aptitude and power for the higher walks of art. The accessories are, however, in this part of subsidiary importance, but the general effect is completely satisfactory.

H. O'Neil, the new A.R.A., whose "Eastward Ho!" is writing some copies of verses in the open air, requires better treatment than he exhibits a small study for one group in the picture "Cheer up, Darling" (113), representing a soldier bidding farewell to his sorrowing wife.

Jas. Clark, whose "Cottage Door" was last year so justly admired, has a pleasing composition in "Interior of a Cottage" (115). ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for March 30, 1859, now comes out in somewhat more ambitious subject, "The Dawning of Genius," of which we have also a large engraving. Mr. Jones (Liverpool Academy), has mistaken the artist's unquestioned talent when we state that, much as we see to admire in the picture, we cannot but feel that it is not the artist's former more homely subject already referred to. Indeed, for nature, feeling, and suggestive poetry it would be no easy task to improve upon "Cheer up, Darling" (113), or "The Cottage Door" (115). It merely refer to it now as an example of how much the success of an artist depends upon the engraving which is to make him known to her homeliest every-day moods is the best source he can go to for his subject. The "Dawning of Genius" tells the story at a glance. A young lad, who has begun to display a "taste for the arts" (we judge he is a musician as well as a painter), is intently occupied with the first sketch he has ever made from the human figure, at a table for the purpose, and held there under gentle restraint by the artist's sister, whose kindly solicitude in the matter is apparent in essence. An elder brother looks on at the progress of the work, and acknowledges the truth of the resemblance with a broad grin of approval. The amusing character of the whole is kept in quiet humour, without exaggeration or straining after effect. The arrangement of the whole group, and the light and shade, and in the furniture and accessories there is nothing de trop introduced to distract the attention from the principal subject of the feature-treatment. The same reserve marks the colouring, which is perhaps a little more subdued than the joyous character of the subject would warrant. The painting is good.

On the opposite side of the door, and serving as a sort of pendant to "The Dawning of Genius," is another picture by Mr. Jones, entitled "Fondly Gazing" (135)—a young mother, with her sleeping infant in a cradle beside her—which singles itself out at once by its quiet, unobtrusive truth to nature. It tells the story at a glance, and in the furniture and accessories there is nothing de trop introduced to distract the attention from the principal subject of the feature-treatment. The same reserve marks the colouring, which is perhaps a little more subdued than the joyous character of the subject would warrant. The painting is good.

"Criticism" (249), by T. C. Hall, is a "telling" bit, in the comic vein, but a little overdone. The denizens of a servants' hall, who have quitted their work to look at a picture, are looking out at them through the half-opened door, are too much "made up," as if they were conscious of acting a part, or sitting for their portraits. The subject is a good one, but not worthy of elaborate recognition from every passer.

E. Gilbert has three pictures in three different walks, each good in its way—"The King's Artillery at Marston Moor" (33), a stirring battle-scene, dashed off with admirable spirit; a scene from "The Merchant of Venice" (34), which, as a whole, is remarkable for illustrating upon the Madness of his Master, and his Own Madness for following him; and a subject called a "bit of the trolley" (35), which is a very clever bit of execution.

Lesley has a single female study (273), "An Idle Moment," treated in his usual broad but somewhat careless manner. W. E. Frost does not display all his accustomed high finish in "Musidora" (431). Elis "Female Head—a Study" (460) is remarkable for character and lifelike truth. Lance tempts us with a desert scene, painted in his grandest style, "Gerfaut in the Desert of Venice" (193), and three other fruit pieces. His pupil, Mr. Duffield, takes a bolder range in a large composition of "Dead Swan, Game, and Fruit" (269), which, in every variety of detail—the Turkey, Thornycroft, and others; and some of them very pleasing and meritorious. But we must reserve further detailed notice for a future day.

The Southampton magistrates have decided upon sending Hires and Lane, the mates of the Anna, of New York, to the United States for trial on the charge of murdering four seamen on board that ship.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

It has needed but a very cursory view of the House of Commons of late to ascertain that members are in a state of considerable curiosity to know why Parliament met three weeks ago. For all the purposes of Ministers it would have been quite as well if the Legislature had been convened, say, last Tuesday, while it would have contributed materially to their avoidance of the peril inevitably attendant on that state of idleness which the hymn-poet has declared results only in mischief. When gentlemen, whose ardour in the cause of their country makes sitting up till two o'clock in the morning for four nights in the week rather a joviality than a bore, are enabled to get into a full tide of chat on the state of the darling affairs of our representative institution every evening at seven o'clock, the chances are considerably in favour of their recurring to the more exceptional but still stimulating excitement of bothering, not to say putting into minorities, a Government which gives cause for suspicion that they are unprepared with their measures. There has been no Ministerial tight-rope dancing by any of the favourite performers, and the postponement of Mr. Gladstone's "soirée mysterieuse," in consequence of the indisposition of the dexterous "presdigateur," was very aggravating to the anxious audience, all of whom had taken their places in the reserved seats, pit, and galleries, a week beforehand. It is not to be supposed but that plenty of sarcastic remarks have been heard about a great nation being kept in suspense because the custodian of the national tre asure had neglected his own chest,—that Europe may tremble; but Mr. Gladstone must recover throat-power for a five hours' speech; and trade may stop, but a Chancellor of the Exchequer must have time for the operation of his gruel and ipecacuanha. However, our representative machime must be worked by its cogs, and a cog or two will sometimes get rusty and need a moment for oiling.

In the enforced absence of other principal performers, Sir Cornewall Lewis has been put forward to do the starring business on the part of Lord Palmerston's company, and in justice be it said that he has gone to work with sufficient unction and no little amount of courage. Any one who knows what the character of Sir C. Lewis's oratory is will be astounded to learn that he has achieved a Parliamentary feat which has been executed in modern times only by the late Lord Macaulay. That noble Lord on one occasion drove a bill right out of the House by the mere force of a speech; and positively Sir C. Lewis effected that object last week by his argument on Mr. M'Mahon's measure for the creation of a court of criminal appeal. Not a soul had a word to say for the bill after he had spoken; and, more, the very principle which it was intended to establish was toppled over; and, but for the fact that the Home Secretary spoke one quarter of an hour too long, he would have been the creator of as complete a specimen of Parliamentary reasoning as has been produced for many a long day. As it was he did a miracle: he actually got votes by a speech. Is it an ill omen that the first division of the Session should have been coincident with a majority against the Ministry? Despite the glib statisticity of Mr. Laing, who is an "artiste" in the cooking of figures, and in the face of Mr. Gladstone's most candid remonstrances, Mr. Wise, who spoke forty pages of estimates, with comments, in forty minutes, had the doubtful satisfaction of having done a great deal to cut down the responsibility of the Executive on the question of public expenditure, by obtaining the appointment of a Committee which shall annually revise the demands for the civil service—six months after the money has not only been voted but spent.

In the course of the conversational interchange of questions and sentiments which has occupied hon. gentlemen until dinner-time there is to be noticed a brief maiden speech of Mr. Selwyn, the member for the University of Cambridge, who evinced an exceedingly accurate conception of the sort of speaking which suits the House of Commons, and who did a service which is simply inestimable in such an assembly—he gave a smart check to a bore who in the short time since Parliament has met had contrived to swell up to portentous magnitude. Never, perhaps, has the idea of the sound which must have issued from the brazen bull of Phalaris been more accurately conveyed to modern ideas than in the blatant, incesssantly blatant, talk of this curious and, to most persons, inexplicable specimen of the occasionally odd results of our representative system, and who seems to have appropriated to himself an undue share of the bronze (or brass, was it?) which the Phœnicians are said to have left behind them in Ireland. Mr. Selwyn, in his keen but polished sarcasm and retort, must have been accepted as the mouthpiece of the House in general, which, with so little to press upon its energies, had already begun to weary of the everlasting roar of this human cataract rather than man, who day after day displayed all the symptoms of a disease which may be called a determination of words to the mouth in their most unpleasant form. In the midst of the Parliamentary paralysis which has prevailed, the Lower House has contrived to pass one bill, and Mr. Ayrton has achieved the honour. Before leaving our necessarily meagre dealings with the Commons it may be mentioned that Mr. Roebuck has opened his mouth; and thereout have flown not merely tropes but more than ordinary evidences of biliary derangement. Anything so near cursing as the first speech of this hon. gentleman this year we never chanced to hear. Accept a miracle!—Mr. Malins has made a good speech, got genuine cheers, and for once emancipated himself from that iteration which the poet has coupled with a very unpolite epithet, and to which he has hitherto seemed to deliver himself without a struggle.

The House of Lords is an august, but in practice a very attenuated, assembly. If the eyes of Europe had been physically, instead of metaphysically, fixed on the gathering of the pillars of our State last Tuesday evening, we are afraid that the eyes of Europe would not have overwhelmingly dazzled. My Lord Normanby has been an amateur actor of pretension, if not of merit, and no one could have better appreciated the dead level of that thin and cold audience which condescended to listen to his maundering advocacy of Austrian interests. Nevertheless, there was much that was suggestive in the debate on the subject of the rumoured proposal to annex Savoy to France. The unanimity of opposition to such a scheme is a fact to be noted; and probably a note will be taken of it in the secret tablets of the most secretive Potentate in the world. There was a tone of defiance to our most intimate ally which pervaded some of the speeches which may yet be heard of. As to Lord Shaftesbury, if that noble Earl were not clothed with an armour of sanctity more precious than the lace and ermine of his peer's robes we should have thought that he was possessed with a demon. He might, judging from mere appearance have been singing—most decidedly fortissimo—the music of Handel and the words of Dryden, in which Timotheus urges Alexander to fire Persepolis; and no one was surprised that the Duke of Newcastle should hastily follow with a version of "Pray, goody, please to moderate the rancour of your tongue," carefully including that part of the admonition conveyed in the song in question which insinuates that "where the judgment's weak the prejudice is strong." On this occasion one heard Lord Derby to great advantage, in the sense of fine speaking, rising to the height of brilliant oratory. It was a study to watch the way in which he gradually worked himself up to the right pitch, dashing appropriate words like a catapult exactly into the points where they were meant to hit, and culminating in a peroration which rolled with a sound as of a rich trumpet, through sentences of a length sufficient to exhaust an ordinary breadth, but which were rounded off with a correctness and a clearness little less than marvellous. So much for the manner of his speech. But, really, it was a little strong to say, with only a trifling circumlocution, that the King of Sardinia was a base and dishonoured scoundrel if he had ever entertained the idea of parting with Savoy; and to ask the Emperor of the French in very plain, though grand and sonorous, English that, if he called himself a gentlemen, he had better take care to behave like one. Certainly, the Rupert of the debate had mounted his most spirited charger on this occasion.

ROSINA.—A VALENTINE.

BY THE LATE T. K. HERVEY.

With gazing on those charms of thine
  My soul grows sad and faint;
But, turning to St. Valentine,
  Who is a gentle saint,
Said I, the fair Rosina keeps
  Her spirit locked from me:
Oh, show my weary heart the hook
  On which she hangs the key!

Her breast is like a frozen lake,
  On whose cold brink I stand;
Oh, buckle on my spirit's skates,
  And take me by the hand!
And lead thou, loving saint, the way
  To where the ice is thin,
That it may break beneath my feet
  And let a lover in.

I see the honey on her lip—
  Have pity, saint, on me,
And turn a lonely gentleman
  Into a humble-bee.
Why is it that an eye whose light
  Should feed but bright-hued petals,
In my poor heart makes only night,
  And grows but stinging nettles?

Whatever men have sung of old
  Of Cynthia or Amena
Seems flat and tame, and dull and cold,
  To paint the young Rosina.
All voices in my dreams seem hers,
  And, through my fancies looming,
All other forms put on the form
  Of bright Rosina's blooming.

Help, help, from thee, Saint Valentine!
  Bring forth thy strongest spell,
Go boldly to her soul's shut gate,
  And ring her spirit's bell,
That she may ope the door at last
  Unto my long desire,
And I take up my chair for life
  Beside her young heart's fire.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

Mr. Edmund Hunt's interesting Cinephantic top was exhibited in the Royal Institution library on Friday, the 3rd inst. It showed various remarkable chromatic phenomena; and it is described by the inventor in the January number of the Artisan.

A New Seismometer (from seismos, earthquake) is described in the last number of the Philosophical Magazine by its inventor, M. Cavalleri, of Monza. The instrument (of which an engraving is given) is intended to mark undulatory, horizontal, vertical, and subsaltatory motions, and the duration of shocks of earthquake.

Terrestrial Magnetism.—In L'Institut will be found two interesting letters on this subject from M. Lamont, of Munich, to M. Quetelet, of Brussels, read before the Royal Belgic Academy. They contain tables of constants and other details relating to magnetism and meteorology, particularly with respect to Belgium and the north of Europe.

New Application of the Electric Light.—M. Despretz recently presented to the French Academy of Sciences, in the name of M. Fonsagrives, the chief physician for the marine department at Cherbourg, an apparatus intended to illuminate the cavities in the human organism by means of the electric light. This apparatus has been constructed by M. Ruhmkorff under the direction of M. Du Moncel. It is approved of by M. Velpeau, and is described in L'Institut.

The Origin of Species is discussed in the new number of the Annals of Natural History, in a review of the work of Mr. Darwin, which is now exciting so much attention in the scientific world. The reviewer does not coincide with the author's views, and handles his hypotheses rather severely, while he admits the great ability manifested in the book, and its highly interesting character. A report of Professor Huxley's proposed lecture on this subject at the Royal Institution on Friday, the 10th instant, will appear next week.

A Telegraphic Communication between Europe and America has been devised by M. Jousselin, director of the railway telegraphs from Paris to the Mediterranean. He proposes that the line should proceed thus: London, Paris, Strasbourg; through Germany to Warsaw; across the Russian empire to Siberia, thence to Behring Straits, which it would cross by a submarine cable; afterwards traverse North America diagonally till it reached New York. M. Jousselin computes the cost at about thirty millions of francs. The gravest objection seems to be in the difficulty of traversing Russian America, a country desolated by a continual winter.—Cosmos.

Hypnotismi, or Nervous Sleep, now exciting so much attention in the French medical world, and which was subjected to examination in this country in 1843, in consequence of the publication of Mr. Braid's work on the subject, now appears to have been known to Father Kircher and others two centuries ago. In his "Ars Magna," published in 1646, he describes various experiments on a fowl. He terms the phenomena actinobolism, or irradiation. Daniel Swenter, also, in 1636, recounts similar experiments. These facts were reported to the French Academy recently by M. Guerry.—L'Institut.

M. Helmholtz on Vowel Sounds is the leading paper of this month's Philosophical Magazine. It contains an account of experiments made with a series of eight tuning-forks, the lowest note of which was B, the deepest octave of a bass voice, and B, the highest octave of a soprano. Each tuning-fork was fastened between the ends of a horseshoe electr magnet and joined to a properly-tuned resonant tube. The mouths of these tubes were provided with movable covers, which might be removed by means of thread whose ends were fastened to a set of pianoforte keys. The tuning-forks were set in motion by electric currents. By this means Professor Helmholtz combined various notes, and learnt by degrees to imitate the sounds of U, O, E, A, &c. The paper of this accomplished philosopher merits the earnest attention of students of acoustics.

LECTURES AT THE ROYAL INSTITUTION.

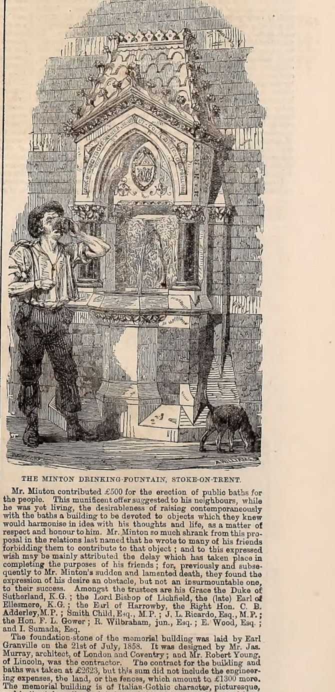
Professor Tyndall delivered his fourth lecture "On Light and Colours" on Thursday, the 2nd inst. The first subject discussed was the colour of water and ice. By means of the electric light sent through a tube fifteen feet long, partly filled with water, the colour of pump water was shown to be amber and yellow, and that of distilled water to be bluish-green. Common river water shown in this delicate way is almost opaque. Pure water in large quantity (as in the Lake of Geneva) and masses of ice (as in the glaciers of the Alps) have a pure blue colour, which is also that of fine granular mountain snow. The professor then entered upon the consideration of the structure of the human eye, and exhibited, by means of a large model and other apparatus, its several parts and the various phenomena of ordinary vision, long sight, and short sight. He also demonstrated that a luminous impression endures for a certain time on the retina (as appears in the ring of fire produced by the circular motion of the end of a lighted cane), and stated that a cannon ball at the greatest velocity would appear stationary if illuminated by a flash of lightning.

On Friday, the 3rd inst., Mr. Frederick Field, F.R.S.E., delivered a lecture upon the "Mineral Treasures of the Andes." Mr. Field, who has spent upwards of twelve years in South America, illustrated his subject by numerous diagrams and maps, having especial reference to the mineral deposits in Chili and Peru. Many beautiful specimens were upon the table, including some of the very rare silver minerals. The bromide of silver and the sulpho-arsenuret of the same metal attracted much attention from their beautiful crystalline form. Of course in the space of an hour many very interesting species had altogether to be omitted, the lecturer confining himself particularly to the copper and silver minerals, which, indeed, constitute the chief wealth of the vast ranges of mountains extending from Cape Horn to the equator. The Rev. John Barlow, the hon. secretary, was in the chair.

Dr. Edwin Lankester (on Saturday last) gave his second lecture on "The Relation of the Animal Kingdom to the Industry of Man." He described the classes Protozoa and Cœlenterata; including the sponges and polyps. After commenting upon the forms and structure of the interesting diatoms, he gave an account of the sponges. The skeletons of these animals are either silicious, calcareous, or horny. The last are the sponges of commerce. The uses of this substance were alluded to, and specimens from the establishment of Mr. Newton, of Princes-street, were exhibited. The red coral (Corallium rubrum) was next described, and the natural history of the polyp which produces it; the chemical composition of the coral, and the uses to which it is applied, were detailed. A series of beautiful specimens of coral carvings, and a great variety of its ornamental application, were kindly lent by Mr. Phillips, of Cockspur-street, and laid on the lecture-table. The next lecture will be on shells, pearls, &c.

Professor Owen gave his fifth lecture on "Fossil Reptiles" on Tuesday last, treating upon the reptiles of the mesozoic (or middle-life) period of the earth's history. The enaliosauria, or sea-lizards, were backboned, air-breathing, cold-blooded animals, provided with four pairs of limbs, shaped like fins, adapted to swimming after their food, the fishes. Of the sub-order sauropterygia, the genera, nothosaurus, simosaurus, and placodus were chiefly dwelt on. The last creature most probably dwelt on the sea-shore and lived upon shellfish, being provided with strong, grinding, crushing teeth, resembling paving-stones. In proportion to its entire skull the placodus had the largest grinding-tooth in the animal kingdom, the elephant itself not excepted. The lecture concluded with an account of the plesiosaurus, first discovered by Conybeare, at Lyme-Regis, Dorset, in 1822, and described by him and De la Beche—one of the most important additions made by geology to comparative anatomy. Of this animal Cuvier says:—"To the head of a lizard it united the teeth of a crocodile, a neck of enormous length resembling the body of a serpent, a trunk and tail having the proportions of an ordinary quadruped, the ribs of a chameleon, and the paddles of a whale." Reference was made to Mr. Waterhouse's restorations at the Crystal Palace grounds, Sydenham.

A partial eclipse of the moon took place on Tuesday morning. The state of the atmosphere was especially favourable for the observation of the phenomenon, the sky being without a cloud. When the eclipse was at its maximum eight-tenths of the moon were obscured.



In 1858 13,963 oz. of gold, valued at £51,999, were exported from New South Wales; and 2,555,263oz., valued at £10,221,052, from Victoria. The gross total net quantity and value of gold exported from both colonies since May, 1851, to December, 1858, is 19,602,640oz., and £74,460,094.

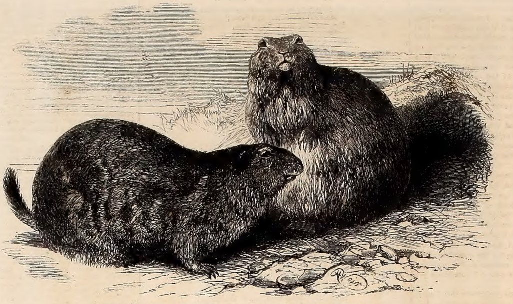
Lord Palmerston on Private Property in Time of War. The important subject of the proposed exemption of private property from capture at sea in time of war was brought before Lord Palmerston yesterday week by an influential deputation, comprising representatives from Liverpool, Leeds, Hull, Sheffield, Gloucester, and Belfast. The noble Lord differed altogether from the views urged by the deputation. He held that the right of seizing the ships, and more particularly the seamen navigating the ships, of foreign Powers, was an essential condition of England's supremacy on the high seas, and characterised the argument that private property was spared by belligerents on land as altogether unfounded. On the contrary (said his Lordship), armies in an enemy's country took whatever they wanted or desired, without the slightest regard to the rights of property, as we should find to our cost if a hostile army should ever succeed in landing in this country.

THE MINTON TESTIMONIAL BUILDING,

STOKE-ON-TRENT.

The name of Minton has become "familiar as a household word" where art is admired, probity is valued, and goodness is beloved; and, while we hope that at no distant day the form of Minton may be found in one of the nation's most honoured localities, amongst the statues of the men of mark who have adorned their respective ages, we rejoice to know of the erection and completion of a memorial building to Mr. Minton near the home scene of his manufacturing labours and successes, in the midst of a district which, while it will never forget the names of Wedgwood, Wood, Spode, and others, will ever hold the name of Minton in peculiar remembrance.

THE MINTON DRINKING-FOUNTAIN, STOKE-ON-TRENT.



Mr. Minton contributed £500 for the erection of public baths for the people. This munificent offer suggested to his neighbours, while he was yet living, the desirableness of raising contemporaneously with the baths a building to be devoted to objects which they knew would harmonise in idea with his thoughts and life, as a matter of respect and honour to him. Mr. Minton so much shrank from this proposal in the relations last named that he wrote to many of his friends forbidding them to contribute to that object; and to this expressed wish may be mainly attributed the delay which has taken place in completing the purposes of his friends; for, previously and subsequently to Mr. Minton's sudden and lamented death, they found the expression of his desire an obstacle, but not an insurmountable one, to their success. Amongst the trustees are his Grace the Duke of Sutherland, K.G.; the Lord Bishop of Lichfield, the (late) Earl of Ellesmere, K.G.; the Earl of Harrowby, the Right Hon. C. B. Adderley, M.P.; Smith Child, Esq., M.P.; J. L. Ricardo, Esq., M.P.; the Hon. F. L. Gower; R. Wilbraham, jun., Esq.; E. Wood, Esq.; and I. Sumada, Esq.

The foundation-stone of the memorial building was laid by Earl Granville on the 21st of July, 1858. It was designed by Mr. Jas. Murray, architect, of London and Coventry; and Mr. Robert Young, of Lincoln, was the contractor. The contract for the building and baths was taken at £2623, but this sum did not include the engineering expenses, the land, or the fences, which amount to £1300 more. The memorial building is of Italian-Gothic character, picturesque, and in its style well calculated to exhibit with effect the use of local materials. It contains accommodation for the School of Art, apartments being provided for modeling and drawing schools, studios for the masters, and with a large room sixty feet by twenty-five (occupying the upper part of the front building) available for general purposes, for exhibitions, &c. Rooms are also provided for a savings-bank, &c. The bath building, which is immediately behind the memorial building, and faces the side street (in which are the entrances), contains first and second class baths for each sex, with every requisite and convenience. A large swimming-bath, fifty feet by thirty feet, is provided. A residence for the keeper of both buildings is also a portion of the whole. Externally the buildings show three fronts. Red brick is the principal material employed, relieved with dressings, bands, and moulded work of Hollington stone: bands and enriched cornices of terra cotta (manufactured by Minton) are judiciously introduced. The building exhibits several new and pleasing peculiarities of design; but the limited means at the disposal of the promoters somewhat cramped the efforts of the architect, and necessitated the interior being of a somewhat plainer character, though amply sufficient for its purpose.

DRINKING-FOUNTAIN.

We also engrave on the preceding page a drinking-fountain now in course of execution at the corner of Park-street and Trentham-road, facing the angle of Memorial-buildings. It is the gift of Colin Minton Campbell, Esq., nephew of the late Mr. Minton. The material is Mansfield stone. The panel at back is majolica, and is a representation, in slight relief and colour, of water-plants, ferns, &c., out of which springs a jet of water—the most appropriate and pleasing idea we have yet had to notice. The design is by Mr. Murray, and the work was executed by Mr. Young. The cost is about £80.

PRAIRIE DOGS IN THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S GARDENS, REGENT'S PARK.

MALAGA.

This seaport, which a few weeks ago was the head-quarters of the third corps of the Spanish army destined for Morocco, is situated on the south-east coast of Spain, and is about eighty miles from Gibraltar. It is the principal port of the province of Granada, and lies in the bight of a bay on the coast of the Mediterranean. Inland from the city extends a spacious and fertile plain, called La Hoya, bounded by ranges of lofty mountains. Malaga is of great antiquity, and claims to have been founded eight or nine centuries B.C. by the Phœnicians, who gave it the name of "Malcha," or "Royal," to intimate the estimation in which they held it. But of this high antiquity there is no evidence. It was possessed successively by the Carthaginians; by the Romans, who called it "Malaca," and made it a municipium and confederate city; by the Goths, and by the Arabs. For the first three centuries of the Moslem domination in Spain, Malaga was subject to the caliphs of the Cordoba; but on the disruption of that caliphat it fell into the hands of one petty sovereign after another, till it was annexed, early in the thirteenth century, to the kingdom of Granada. In 1487 Ferdinand and Isabella wrested it from the Moors, after an obstinate siege of three months, during which the citizens endured the severest horrors of famine. It was taken in 1810 by the French, and remained in their possession till the year 1812. Malaga has suffered severely in different periods from plague, which on one occasion cut off 20,000 of the population in forty days; and in 1803-4 the yellow fever decimated the population.

From the earliest ages, under all the nations who have possessed it, Malaga has been renowned for its commerce. At the present day it is the only flourishing city in the province of Andalusia. Its imports are broad-cloths, cottons, laces, spices, hardware, and cutlery. Its exports are much more considerable, and amount on the yearly average to more than £1,000,000 sterling. They consist principally of wine and fruits; the former, which was once well known in England as "mountain," is now almost wholly consumed in the United States and in Spanish America; the latter are chiefly fresh grapes and raisins, vast quantities of which reach the English market, together with some figs, almonds, oranges, and lemons. The other exports are brandy, oil, saffron, vermicelli, barilla, and soap, which is the only manufacture of Malaga worthy of mention.

Malaga at present contains about 100,000 inhabitants. Though the streets are narrow, tortuous, wretchedly paved, and not very clean, the city has a gay and cheerful aspect, as the exteriors of the houses are whitewashed or stained a yellow-ochre colour. Many of the roofs are flat, as in the East, and are surrounded by miradores, or square towers, with open galleries, where the citizens enjoy the cool sea-breezes. The city is divided into six parishes, and has several colleges and public hospitals, an ironfoundry of very recent erection, and a tobacco-factory where nearly 1000 persons are employed in making cigars. There were also twenty-four convents, but these were suppressed in 1835. Malaga is an episcopal see, and possesses a cathedral, a light and handsome building in the Greco-Gothic style; it is nearly 400 feet long, 180 broad, 125 in height from the pavement to the roof, and is surmounted by a steeple 270 feet high. The alameda, or public promenade, is adorned with fountains and flowering shrubs, and flanked by private mansions of great splendour. The harbour of Malaga is spacious enough to accommodate a large fleet; it is protected on the east by a massy stone mole 700 feet in length, terminated by a handsome lighthouse. The Rivers Guadelmina and Guadalorce discharge their waters at this place into the sea: the former, a mere brook in summer, becomes in winter a stream of considerable volume. Few remains of Roman architecture now exist in Malaga; those of Moorish buildings are numerous, and are interspersed through the city in gateways, towers, walls, houses, and fragments of mosques. But the grand boast of Malaga is the Moorish castle, built in 1279, and covering the slope of a hill immediately to the east of the city. It is of great extent, and is divided into the lower castle, or alcazaba, and the upper, or gibralfaro, so called by the Moors from a Roman pharos which is said to have stood on the crest of the hill. The whole displays in its ruinous condition the effects of the Christian artillery in the siege of 1487.

THE PRAIRIE DOG.

The Hon. F. Grantley Berkeley, having recently returned from a sporting tour in the prairies of the Western States of America, has, jointly with the proprietors of the Field newspaper (in which the account of his adventures is intended to appear), presented to the Zoological Society's Gardens, Regent's Park, a specimen of the Marmot, so abundant in the prairies, which is commonly known as the "Prairie-dog." A description and figure of this little animal, which is the first of the sort that has been exhibited alive in Europe, will not fail to be of interest to our readers.

The Prairie dog, or prairie-marmot (the Arctomys ludovicianus of naturalists), belongs to the same group of animals as the Marmot of the Alps, with which all who have taken a tour in Switzerland, or read Tschudi's or other descriptions of the "Alpenwelt," are probably familiar. Several other marmots are found in North America; and these animals are, in fact, abundant in the higher and more elevated districts of the northern parts of both hemispheres. They are properly classed in the family of squirrels (Sciuridæ), and are really not very distantly related to the well-known squirrel of this country, although the modification of structure, which adapts them for a life upon the ground instead of in the forest, renders them somewhat dissimilar in outward appearance. The Prairie-dog, as the hunters have named it from some fancied resemblance between its chirping cry and a dog's bark, lives in large communities in the boundless prairies of the Far West. Dr. S. W. Woodhouse, who was attached as naturalist to the expedition for the survey of the Zuni and Colorado Rivers sent out by the United States' Government under the command of Captain Sitgreaves in 1852, says that one of their "dogtowns," as the trappers call them, passed through in Texas must have been thirty miles in extent. Throughout these the burrows of these animals are situated at nearly regular intervals—about twenty or thirty feet apart. Their inhabitants sit at the entrances of the holes, and keep up an incessant chirping, at the same time jerking their tails. On the approach of danger they retire "indoors" with such rapidity that it is difficult to secure them as, when shot at, they always manage to tumble into their holes and disappear far underground. Their nests, placed at the extremity of the burrow, are composed of fine dry grass compactly put together. The food of these creatures consists principally of grass and insects.

Two other animals, apparently very ill-assorted neighbours, are commonly found sharing the parts of the prairie occupied by the Prairie-dog. The rattlesnake often tenants the burrows, and seems to be no subject of fear to the former, though it, doubtless, preys on the younger animals. But the most constant companion of the Prairie-dog is a small owl (Strix hypogæa), which builds its nest in the deserted holes, and keeps "watch and ward" at the entrance, like its former occupant. "On being approached," says Dr. Woodhouse, these birds, which are seen standing on the little hillock of earth by the edge of the burrows, retire, leaving nothing but their heads above the ground. They commence chattering and bowing, presenting quite a ludicrous appearance. On coming nearer they either disappear into their burrows altogether, or skim over the plain for some distance, alighting at the entrance of another hole, where they again commence their chattering.

THE MINTON TESTIMONIAL MUSEUM AND SCHOOL OF DESIGN, STOKE-ON-TRENT.

THE INSTITUTE OF FRANCE.

THE building now called the Palace of the Institute formerly bore the appellation of the Collège des Quatre Nations. It is admirably situated on the left bank of the Seine, opposite the Old Louvre, from which it is separated by the Pont des Arts, a part of which is seen in our Engraving. Unfortunately, in an architectural point of view, it is totally unworthy of its brilliant neighbour, and may be regarded as one of the failures of that generally successful architect, Louis Levau. The Cardinal Mazarin, by his will, dated the 6th of March, 1661, founded a college here for sixty gentlemen, and left a considerable sum for the support of what he wished to be called the Mazarin College, but which was more familiarly known to the public by the name of the College of the Four Nations (meaning the four provinces into which France was divided). It was constructed on the site of the ancient Hôtel de Nesle, of which the last remains were then demolished; but it was not till the 29th of October, 1795, that the different academies, as at that time constituted, were installed there. Previously to that period the several learned associations had held their sittings at the Louvre.

The centre of the façade of the Palace of the Institute consists of a rather heavy decoration of the Corinthian order; it served formerly for the portal of the church of the College, but leads at present to the salle devoted to ceremonial purposes. On each side of the steps leading to the portal, two lazy-looking lions in cast iron pour forth a thin stream of water into stone troughs. Two semicircular wings connect the portal with the pavilions, supported by arcades: that on the left is devoted to the celebrated Mazarin Library, and the apartments of its distinguished conservator, M. Philarète Chasles, where course of lectures at the College of France on "The Conquest of Hindostan by the English" has of late created so much sensation in Paris on account of the impartiality of his criticisms; that on the left is occupied by M. Horace Vernet, the great painter. Halévy, the musical composer; M. de Sacy, the editor of the Journal des Débats; and M. Villemain, the Secretary of the Academy, also inhabit the Institute.

The literary and scientific origin of the Institute of France dates as far back as 1629, when a number of learned men resolved upon meeting together occasionally in secret for the purpose of discussing matters of literary or scientific interest. Their secret, however, became subsequently known to Cardinal Richelieu, who employed his powerful influence for the public recognition of what he considered would be a great national advantage. The first registers of the Academy bear the date of March 13, 1634. At first it held its sittings at the Hôtel des Fernes; in 1673 it was transferred to the Louvre, where it continued down to the period mentioned above. The Institute, as at present constituted, is divided into five sections:—

1. The French Academy. 2. The Academy of Inscriptions and Literature. 3. The Academy of Sciences. 4. The Academy of Fine Arts. 5. The Academy of Moral and Political Science.

FATHER LACORDAIRE, THE NEWLY-ELECTED MEMBER OF THE FRENCH ACADEMY.

The first of these is the most important, and that with which we have to do on the present occasion. The Académie Française is familiarly spoken of as "The Forty," because its members are strictly confined to that number: it is this section which is charged with the compilation of the celebrated Dictionary of the French Academy, and the Academicians are at present busy also with the production of an historical dictionary of the French language. Amongst literary men the greatest object of ambition is to possess a fauteuil at the Academy, for which it is necessary to obtain the majority of the suffrages of the survivors each time that a death takes place in its learned ranks; and, although many who have merited a seat have never been chosen, the body may nevertheless be regarded as comprising the cream of French talent and French intellect. The Abbé Lacordaire has just been elected a member in the place of M. de Tocqueville, recently deceased. The reception speech, we understand, is to be pronounced by M. Guizot, and will, no doubt, be worthy of that great orator and of the eloquent Dominican.

Of the Académie Française there are no foreign or honorary members, but with the other four sections are associated the names of the most illustrious notabilities of literature and science throughout the world.

We now proceed to give a biographical notice of the new Academician.

FATHER LACORDAIRE.

Jean Baptiste Henri Lacordaire, of the Order of Preaching Friars, elected a member of the French Academy on the 2nd of February, 1860, was born at Recey-sur-Ource on the 12th of May, 1802. At an early age he lost his father, who was a surgeon in the French Navy, and the young Lacordaire was brought up, as well as his three brothers, at Dijon, under the care of his mother, Anne Marie Dugied, a woman of rare merit and devotion, and member of an honourable family of that city.

From the year 1809 Henri was sent to college, where he soon distinguished himself in the different branches of university study, and left, at the end of ten years, covered with crowns and with laurels, as is the custom with successful scholars in French colleges, but more or less imbued with the Voltairian principles which characterised most of the youth of that period. On leaving college he took to the study of the law, and went to Paris, where his progress seemed to promise for him a brilliant career at the bar; but suddenly, to the great astonishment of those of his former companions who had not observed the gradual change in his convictions, he entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice. Three years afterwards he was ordained a priest. He was then only twenty years of age. The Archbishop of Paris immediately named him almoner of one of the convents within the visitation of Paris. Towards the end of 1828 the Abbé Lacordaire exchanged this modest position for that of assistant almoner at the College of Henri IV.; but, these functions not sufficing to occupy so active a mind, and not affording him the opportunity for displaying his evangelical zeal, he formed the project of going as a missionary to the United States of America. The Archbishop of New York even offered the title of Vicar-General; but during these overtures the Revolution of July broke out, and the Abbé felt the moment to be opportune for announcing openly to the people the reign of religious and political liberty. Such was also the opinion of M. de Lamenais, of M. de Montalembert, Gerbet, De Coux, &c.; and it was with this object that they founded together a newspaper entitled L'Avenir. It became necessary, moreover, to combat the tendency in many superficial minds to look upon religion as the accomplice of Royalty in its conflicts with the new institutions, and, in order to repudiate this identity and to liberate the Church from such a dangerous accusation, the paper took boldly in hand the cause of the people against their oppressors. The Abbé Lacordaire threw himself into the midst of this struggle with the energy of a young and energetic mind, and with the indomitable courage of a devoted heart and a profound conviction. One of the articles in the Avenir, addressed to the Bishops of France, written by the Abbé, having been submitted to a jury, at the same time as another article from the pen of M. de Lamenais, Lacordaire defended himself with much original frankness, and the accused were acquitted. Two months previously the Abbé had sought to have his name inscribed on the list of the advocates at the Royal Court of Paris, but the Council of Discipline, converting itself into a council of canonists, would not grant this legitimate request.

The editors of the Avenir were not yet at the end of their undertaking to form public opinion and to excite it to conquer the vital liberty of instruction. MM. de Coux, De Montalembert, and Lacordaire assembled together a number of children and turned schoolmasters. "Liberty," said they, "cannot be given; it must be taken!" The University thought that they had taken too much liberty; the free school was shut up, and its founders condemned to pay a fine by the decision of the Chamber of Peers, alone capable of judging the question on account of the rank of M. de Montalembert. The Abbé Lacordaire again pleaded his cause and that of his school with an energy, an originality, and an eloquence that are still remembered.

However, so much boldness and so much novelty astonished the Government, political parties, and the clergy. Attacked on all sides, the editors of the Avenir fancied that they could only become really strong with the support of apostolic authority, of which they had upheld the rights throughout; so, on the 15th of November, 1831, they voluntarily suspended the journal, went to Rome, and there presented to the Holy See a memorial explaining their intentions and their acts. The somewhat tardy reply of Gregory XVI. was calculated to dissipate all their illusions; an encyclical letter condemned the doctrines of the Avenir. With the exception of the principal editor, upon whom the blow fell more heavily than upon his younger colleagues, they all submitted without reserve to the Pope's decision. Father Lacordaire, after having made long but useless efforts to cause M. de Lamenais to yield, separated from him, yet not without a deep feeling of regret; he returned then to private life, and resumed his studies in the same modest convent of visitation where he had found an asylum on leaving the Seminary of Saint Sulpice. It was there that the director of the Stanislaus College sought him in 1834 for the purpose of soliciting a series of lectures to his pupils. The small chapel of this establishment was becoming insufficient for the constantly augmenting auditory, when, in consequence of the extreme agitation produced in his young hearers by the preacher's brilliant improvisation, these conferences, as they were called, were discontinued.

At this same period the Abbé Lacordaire, in order to mark the wide difference of opinion which separated him from the former principal editor of the Avenir, drew up his "Considerations on the Philosophical System of M. de Lamenais." He only published them, however, just at the moment when "The Words of a Believer" appeared. This latter work completely isolated M. de Lamenais from his former friends: even the Abbé Gerbet, one of his most attached supporters, separated from him publicly. The previous determination of the Abbé Lacordaire became thereby justified, not only in his own conscience, but in that of every one else.

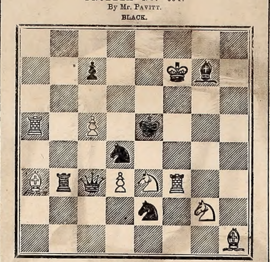
At length the pulpit of Notre Dame was opened to him. He shone there in 1835 and 1836, and his elocution was brilliant, convincing, and full of originality. It could not be denied that his eloquence was appropriate to the spirit of the time; yet the fiery energy of the preacher, the subjects that obtained his preference, the rashness even of his improvisation, inspired some persons with exaggerated fears. Such was not, however, the case with the Archbishop of Paris, who, at the very moment when the conferences were suspended, called their author a new prophet, and overwhelmed him with his benedictions. The approbation of his spiritual chief, and the sympathies of his every-day-increasing auditory, did not, however, prevent Father Lacordaire from arriving at the conclusion that his labours in aid of the religious restoration of the country could not be successful unless they were participated in and supported by a special institution of preachers. This institution had already existed in France: it was the order of St. Dominic, or of the Preaching Friars. Profoundly convinced of the utility and the excellence of his object, he frankly and boldly made an appeal to public opinion on the subject in his memoir "On the Re-establishment in France of the Order of Preaching Friars," in which he sought to prove that the religious orders were especially civilising, beneficial, and popular. This memoir called forth no contradiction; neither did the Abbé's "Life of St. Dominic," written by him some time after.

In 1840 he entered one of the monasteries of Preaching Friars at Rome as a novice, made his vows at the Convent of La Quercia, and on the occasion of his monastic baptism added to his other Christian names that of Dominic. The white woollen robe of the new Dominican soon reappeared in the pulpit of Notre Dame. This costume of an austere poverty, unknown to the new generation, might have awakened many prejudices; it was not so, however, and Father Lacordaire once more found himself surrounded by friends and auditors who admired every expression that fell from his lips. A number of young men of great merit gave up high positions and abandoned their earthly expectations to follow him in this career of self-denial and devotion; and it was in this manner that several Dominican monasteries were successively formed. The progress of the real spirit of religious toleration had been so great in France during some years that all these foundations were established with entire freedom, and under the simple protection of the common law. The same may be said of the institutions for instruction actually directed by the third order of St. Dominic, of which Father Lacordaire is the Vicar-General. Since the 8th of August, 1854, he has also been the director of the celebrated School of Sorèze, and the exercise of his functions in that capacity recalls to mind most favourably the diligent and enthusiastic schoolmaster of 1831.

The Revolution of February, 1848, was almost the cause of his return to the political arena. Elected by the department of the Bouches-du-Rhone a member of the Constituent Assembly, he sat there during some time, dressed in his monastic costume, on the highest of the Republican benches; but the sterile discussions that took place daily in the midst of this assembly possessed no interest for him; his proper tribune was the Christian pulpit; this he soon perceived, and, consequently, resigned his seat.

During a number of years Father Lacordaire has displayed as a preacher the most indefatigable activity and, it must be admitted, vast knowledge, great courage, and an immense talent for improvisation. Most of the cities of France have listened delightedly to his discourses. In 1845 the Academy of Lyons voted him by acclamation one of its members, and a few years subsequently the Academy of Dijon conferred a similar honour upon him.

The apostolic labours of the Abbé are resumed in his "Conferences of Paris and Toulouse," which constitute a complete exposition of the Roman Catholic dogma and philosophy. In a simply literary point of view these "Conferences" may be looked upon as one of the eminent titles of Father Lacordaire to the academical crown which has just been conferred upon him. His other writings comprise a great number of memoirs and studies on different questions of religious controversy, literary and biographical articles, funeral orations, speeches relating to education, &c. All these productions are remarkable for his peculiar qualities of energy, profundity, and elegant originality; but it is especially to his lofty and popular eloquence that Lacordaire owes his well-merited reputation. He will represent, at the French Academy, Christian eloquence in the most elevated and most perfect modern sense of the expression. We congratulate the illustrious Académie Française on the mark of sympathy and respect which they have conferred on the eminent Dominican by electing him one of "The Forty."



All the brothers of the Abbé Lacordaire mentioned at the outset of our article are still living: his elder brother is at present Rector of the University of Liège. Of the two remaining and younger Lacordaires, one, an engineer and architect, has been for the last ten years the director of the Imperial Manufactory of the Gobelins; and the other is a retired cavalry officer, who has served his country for a long period with distinction in Algeria during the French conquest of that colony.

THE REVISED CODE OF CHESS LAWS.

Shorn of their commentary and the copious illustrations derived from a host of celebrated authors, ancient and modern, who have written on the subject, the following are the new Regulations for Chessplaying, propounded in Mr. Staunton's "Chess Praxis."* These rules, it may be observed, are, for the most part, in harmony with those proposed by the author's colleagues in the labour of revising the Chess Laws (Messrs. Heydebrand der Laza and Jaenisch), and wherever this is not the case the reader of the work will find the divergence admitted and the reasons for it fully stated in the accompanying notes.

REGULATIONS FOR PLAYING.

Private Agreement.—Either at the commencement or in the course of a game, the players may mutually agree upon any deviation from the laws they think proper. But a player who has conceded an indulgence to his opponent has no right to demand a similar concession, unless it was specially stipulated to be reciprocal. Every player is bound by the laws of the game in all cases not provided for by distinct agreements to the contrary.

Rule I. Wrong Position of the Chessboard.—If during the progress of a game either player discovers that the chessboard has been improperly placed he may insist on its being adjusted. The game to proceed from the point where the adjustment took place, as if no mistake in the position of the board had been made. (N.B. Lookers-on are privileged to inform the players of the chessboard being wrongly placed.)

II. Omission or Misplacement of the Chessmen.—If at any time in the course of a game it is found that the men were not properly placed, or that one or more of them were omitted at the beginning, the game in question must be annulled.

III. Right of Move and Choice of Colour.—The right of making the first move and (if either player require it) of choosing the colour of the men must be decided by lot. Each player then moves one man at a time, except in case of castling, or where odds of moves are given, or where his adversary has forfeited his move, alternately throughout the game. In any series of games between the same players at one sitting or in one match, each shall have the first move alternately in all the games whether won or drawn. But if a game is annulled, that is, not played out, the player who had the first move in that game shall move first in the next. When the players have each made one move in a game they must be considered to have chosen the men, and must retain them throughout the whole of a sitting or match, unless otherwise agreed by mutual arrangement.

IV. Commencing out of Turn.—If a player make the first move in a game when it is not his turn to do so, the game must be annulled and begun again, if the error is noticed by the adversary before he has made his fourth move. After four moves have been made on each side the game must proceed and be considered legal. If it occur in a match, the player deprived of the move must, when more games have to be played, take an additional first move in compensation.

V. Playing Two Moves in Succession.—If in the course of a game a player move a man when it is not his turn to play, he must retract the last move, and, if his adversary chooses, after he himself has moved, must play the man wrongly moved, if it can be played legally. But the adversary can only enforce this penalty before touching a man in reply. If the error is discovered later it must be rectified by the Giuoco a Monte, without penalty. This rule applies only to complete moves, not to merely touching a man.

VI. Touch and Move.—A player must never touch any of the men except when it is his turn to play, and then only such man of his own as he intends to move, or such of his adversary's as he intends to take. A player who touches with his hand one of his own men when it is his turn to play, must move it if it can be legally moved, unless before touching it he say J'adoube or words to the same effect. And a player who touches one of his adversary's men (under the same conditions) must take it. If in either case the move cannot legally be made, the offender must move his King, and in the event of the King having no legal move he must play any other man legally movable that his adversary pleases. If a player, however, touches a man, in consequence of a false cry of "Check," or, being checked and not apprised of it by his adversary, touches a man, he is not obliged to play it, or, having played it, may retract the move.

VII. Touching a Square with a Man.—A move is complete and irrevocable (provided it be a legal one) the moment the piece or Pawn has quitted the player's hand, but as long as the hand remains on the man touched it may be played to any square it commands which the player has not touched with it during his deliberation on the move. But it must always be played to a different square from that it occupied previously to the move, and, if it has touched all the squares it commands, it must be played to any one of them the opponent elects.

VIII. False Moves.—If a player be guilty of a false move by playing a piece or Pawn of his own to a square to which it cannot be legally moved, or capture an adverse man by a move which cannot legally be made, he must, at the choice of his adversary, either move his own or take the adverse man legally, forfeit his turn to move, or play any other man legally movable which his adversary may select. Castling, under circumstances forbidden in the fundamental laws, must be considered a false move in the meaning of this clause.

IX. Touching more than one Man.—If a player, when it is his turn to play, touch with his hand more than one of his own men (unless in castling), or of his adversary's, he must, when the men touched are his own, play any one of them legally movable that his opponent selects. When they are his adversary's, he must capture whichever of them his antagonist chooses, provided it can be legally taken. If, in such case, it happens that none of the men so touched can be moved or captured, then the offender must move his King, and, if the King cannot legally be moved, he must play any other piece or Pawn legally movable that his opponent may name.

X. Enforcing Penalties. Giuoco a Monte.—A penalty can only be enforced before the adversary has touched a man in reply. If an illegality is discovered at any later period, the move on which it was committed, and all made subsequently, must be retracted, and the error corrected at the offending party's own option. If the source of a manifest illegality cannot be discovered, the game must be annulled. When the King is moved as a penalty, the player cannot castle on that move, and of course forfeits his right to castle during that game.

XI. Check.—A player must audibly say "Check" when he makes a move which puts the hostile King in check. The King must then be played out of check, on the move made in reply to that which gives it, either by being moved, by the capture of the checking man, or by the interposition of a man between the King and that which gives check. A player is not compelled to give check because he utters it, unless he has already touched a man which cannot move without giving check. But, if it is uttered and not given, the move on which it is uttered must be retracted and another made, if the adversary require it. If a player move his King into check; if he remove a man which covered his King and thereby place him in check; if, while his King is in check, he touch or move a man which does not cover the check; in either of these cases he has touched or moved a man in such a manner as to subject him to the penalties laid down in section VI. If check is not uttered and the adversary makes a move which really covers the check, such move must stand, as it proves the check to have been observed.

XII. A King Remaining in Check.—If the King of either player is placed in check, and the check is not announced or discovered until one or more moves have been made, all moves subsequently made must be retracted, and the player who ought to have announced the check must make some other move. If the check has been duly announced but still not provided against, the moves must only be retracted as far as that of the King, which must be placed out of check in any manner its player chooses. If, however, the moves subsequent to the unannounced or uncovered check cannot be remembered the game must be annulled. In this case, the player who moved first retains the first move for the next game.

XIII. J'adoube.—When a player touches a man for the purpose of adjusting it, and not with the intention of moving it, he must, before touching it, say J'adoube, or words to that effect. He will then have the right of moving any other man he thinks proper, notwithstanding his having touched the one in question. But this expression must not be used as an afterthought to prevent the necessity of moving a man already touched, nor must it be used to justify the touching of a man which does not require adjusting. If a player say J'adoube after touching a man, or before touching one which does not require adjusting, he is compelled to move or capture the man touched, as if J'adoube had not been said.

XIV. The Counting Fifty Moves.—If at any period of a game one player should persist in repeating a particular check, or series of checks, or the same line of play, his adversary can demand that the game shall be limited to fifty more moves on each side, and, if within that limit neither party win, the game must terminate as a drawn one. So also when a player has only a King remaining on the board, he may insist on the moves being counted from that moment, and, after fifty have been made on each side without result, the game must be considered drawn. This rule is applicable also in cases where one player has only a King and Queen, a King and Rook, a King and Bishop, or a King and Knight, against a superior or equal force. And whenever one player considers that one side can force the game, or that neither side can win it, he has the right of submitting the case to the umpire or bystanders, who shall decide whether it is one for the fifty-move counting.—N.B. But it does not apply to games wherein one party undertakes to mate with a particular man or on a particular square.

XV. Duration.—As a general principle, it is not expedient to limit the time of moving. But in matches of importance it may often be desirable to do so. In such case the best course appears to be the allotting a certain portion of time to each party for a certain number of moves, leaving him to expend his time at his discretion, and, in the event of his exceeding it, to impose a pecuniary fine for every instance of excess. But, though the time occupied in a move is not limited by law, a player must not purposely protract the game with the view of wearying or annoying his opponent.

XVI. Upsetting the Board.—Should the board be upset, and all or any of the men thrown off or out of position, they must be replaced, and the game must proceed in its regular course. And in case of a dispute respecting the replacing, the opinion of the player who did not upset the board shall always prevail over that of the player who did. Wilfully upsetting the board is equivalent to resigning the game.

XVII. Dropped Man.—If at any time it is discovered that a man has dropped off the board, and moves have been made during its absence, such moves shall be retracted and the man restored. If the players cannot agree as to its restoration, the game must be annulled. A dropped man may be replaced on the board without saying J'adoube.

XVIII. Abandoning the Game.—If either player abandon the game, discontinue his moves, voluntarily resign, or refuse to abide by a decision of the umpire, he must be considered to have lost the game.

XIX. The Umpire or Bystanders.—The umpire shall have authority to decide any question whatever that may arise in the course of a game, but must never interfere except when appealed to by one of the players, unless a violation of the fundamental laws has taken place; and when appealed to he must always apply the laws as he finds them herein expressed, and neither assume the power of modifying them or deviating from them in particular cases, according to his own judgment. When a question is submitted to the umpire or to bystanders, by both players, their decision shall be final and binding upon both players. The term bystander comprises any impartial player of eminence who can be appealed to, absent or present.

RULES FOR PLAYING THE GAME AT ODDS.

I. In games where one player gives the odds of a piece, or "the exchange," or allows his opponent to count drawn games as won, or agrees to checkmate with a particular piece or Pawn, or on a particular square, he has the right to choose the men and to move first, unless an arrangement to the contrary is agreed to between the combatants.

II. When the odds of Pawn and one move, or Pawn and more moves, are given, the Pawn given must be understood to be the King's Bishop's Pawn.

III. When a player gives the odds of his King's or Queen's Rook, he must not castle (or, more properly speaking, leap his King) on the side from whence he takes off the Rook, unless before commencing the game or match he stipulates to have the privilege of so doing.

IV. When a player undertakes to give checkmate with one of his Pawns, or with a particular Pawn, the said Pawn must not be converted into a piece.

V. When a player accepts the odds of several moves, he must not play any piece or Pawn beyond the fourth square—i.e., he must not cross the middle line of the board, before his adversary makes his first move. Such several moves are to be collectively considered as the first move of the player accepting the odds.

VI. In the odds of checkmating on a particular square, it must be the square occupied by the King mated, not by the man giving mate.

VII. The player who undertakes to win in a particular manner, and either draws the game or wins in some other manner, must be adjudged to be the loser.

In all other respects the play in games at odds must be governed by the regulations before laid down.

RULES FOR PLAYING THE GAME BY CORRESPONDENCE.

I. In playing a game by correspondence, the two parties should always agree beforehand in writing as to the persons who are to take part in the contest, as to the time and mode of transmitting the moves, as to the penalties to be inflicted for any breach of the contract, and as to the umpire or referee.

II. In a game of this description, a move once dispatched by the medium agreed on cannot be recalled. If a legal move, it must be abided by; and, if an illegal one, the party sending it will be subjected to the same penalty as for a false move played with an opponent vis-à-vis.

III. Neither party shall be obliged to send more than one move at a time, but, if either choose to send more, the moves so sent must be considered irrevocable if legal, and punishable in the manner before stated if unlawful.

IV. When several successive moves are sent at once, and one of them is found to be illegal, the sender must suffer the punishment for a false move, and the game then proceed from that point. The subsequent moves which were forwarded with the illegal one must, however, in that case be cancelled.

V. If a player send hypothetical moves—that is, moves on the assumption that his adversary will make certain others previously—they shall not be binding unless his adversary make the moves assumed.

VI. If a player send more than one move on the same turn to play, the adversary may select which he pleases.

VII. If either party in a game by correspondence accept the assistance of any player not originally engaged to take part in the contest, that party shall forfeit the game.

VIII. If a move bears more than one interpretation the player receiving it must announce, with his next move, which interpretation he adopts, or it must be interpreted according to the intention of the sender.

IX. A move not intelligibly described incurs the penalty of sending no move on the day appointed.

RULES FOR PLAYING THE GAME BY CONSULTATION.

I. The law of touch and move must be observed in these games.

II. Each party must be bound by the move communicated to the adversary, whether it be made on the adversary's board, in writing, or by word of mouth. If the move so communicated should prove to be different from that actually made on the party's own board, the latter must be altered to accord with the former.

III. If either party be detected in moving the men when it is not their turn to play, or in moving more than one man (except in castling) when it is their turn to play, they shall forfeit the game; unless they can show that the man was moved for the purpose of adjusting or replacing it.

IV. If either party has, accidentally or otherwise, removed a man from the board which has not been captured in the course of the game, and made certain moves under the impression that such man was no longer in play, the moves must stand, but the man may be replaced whenever the error is discovered.

V. If either party in a game by consultation permit a bystander to take part in the contest, that party shall forfeit the game.

THE GREAT SEAL OF ENGLAND.

THE chief seal of the Sovereign of England is styled "the Great Seal of England," and is that whereby all patents, warrants, commissions, &c., coming from the Queen are sealed. In law every corporation must make its contracts, &c., under seal; and the Queen being, according to legal interpretation, a corporation, her acts are done under seal. The Great Seal is, therefore, the token of the public faith of the kingdom expressed in the highest and most solemn form. There is also a minor seal, which is put upon charters signed by the Sovereign before they come to the Great Seal, and upon some documents which do not pass the Great Seal at all. The keeper of the minor or Privy Seal is now called the Lord Privy Seal. He is of the Privy Council, and is one of the great officers of the kingdom. But the guardian of the Great Seal is a still more important personage. He is styled the Lord Keeper, who now usually combines his office with that of Lord Chancellor. This, however, was not always so. King Henry V. had two Great Seals, one of gold, which he delivered to the Bishop of Durham, and made him Lord Chancellor; another of silver, which he delivered to the Bishop of London to keep: and historians often confound Chancellors and Keepers; but at this day, there being but one Great Seal, there cannot be both a Chancellor and a Lord Keeper of the Great Seal at one time, because both are but the same office, as is declared by the statute 5 Eliz., 4 Inst. 88; and the taking away the seal determines their authority. The Lord Keeper is, in fact, so constituted by the delivery of the Great Seal to him and his taking his oath. To be Lord Chancellor there is the further requisite of a patent, but the office of either is identically the same. The Lord Keeper or Lord Chancellor is a functionary of the greatest weight and power of any now subsisting in the kingdom, and is superior in point of precedency to every temporal Lord. He is a Privy Councillor by his office, and Speaker or President of the House of Lords by prescription. Being formerly a Churchman (until Sir Thomas More there had usually been any lay Chancellors), the Lord Chancellor presided over the Chapel Royal, and became and is still Keeper of his Sovereign's conscience. He is also for the guardian of the Great Seal. As to this mighty signet itself, the history of the Great Seals of England is not a little remarkable, and admits of much interesting research and detail far beyond our limits.

Several of the seals have circumstances attached to them extremely curious. The first King, an impression of whose seal has come down to us, was Edward the Confessor. We have impressions of two seals of his, and both of them are about two inches and three quarters in diameter, which is a great deal larger than a ring seal could be, but is much smaller than any of those of his successors. Then seals of King Edward are among the first in which a King is represented seated on his throne; and another curious fact is that the lettering in the legend or inscription round the seal is larger than that of any of his successors up to the present reign, although the seal is less than half the size. The inscription on each of the seals is the same, and runs thus: "Sigillum Edwardi Anglorum Basileï."

In the Great Seal of William the Conqueror the inscription round this side is the following: "Hoc Normannorum Willelmum nosce patronum;" and on the other side this is continued, thus, "Hoc Anglis regem signo fatearis eundem." Know by this William is chief of the Normans; by this know the same William is King of the English." It will be seen by this that one side of the seal expressed the sovereignty which William possessed over Normandy, and the other his sovereignty over England. It was, however, from about this time, and no doubt from this circumstance, that the practice of using seals with two sides is dated.

Impressions of seals have mostly been made in wax, and by squeezing a cake of wax between two engraved seals, and all State seals have been so made ever since. Our "Dei gratias" were not upon the first few seals of English Kings. The first who used them was Henry I., but all our Sovereigns have since then adopted them. The size of the Great Seals of England rapidly increased. Richard I.'s Great Seal being four inches in diameter, but from his time till that of Queen Mary the size varied very little, never exceeding four inches and a half in diameter. The first seal of Queen Mary was not larger than that, but on her marriage with Philip of Spain she had a new Great Seal made, representing them both, and this was made five inches and a half in diameter. Since that time the size of the Great Seal has increased but very imperceptibly, the late one being but six inches in diameter.

The seals of the early Kings down to the time of Henry III. were rudely engraved, but that King's seals show greater ornamentation of the throne on which the King is seated. From his time till the time of Henry VIII. the Great Seals form a most beautiful and choice collection in the pure Gothic style, and some of them are exceedingly rich and elegant.

The seal of Queen Elizabeth is a rather curious one. "Good Queen Bess" appears in her starched ruff and a dress which reminds one of the crinoline with which the fair sex think fit to adorn themselves nowadays. Near her shoulders hover clouds, from which on each side an arm and hand project holding up the Royal mantle.

The Great Seals of the Commonwealth must not pass unnoticed, for there was then a curious break in the regular course of the seals. On one side was a representation of the Parliament in solemn conclave assembled, with an inscription, "In the first year of freedome, by God's blessing, restored 1648." On the other side was a map of England. In the year 1651 a similar seal was made, but, in the map, Ireland was included. Oliver Cromwell did not, however, permit this to last long; for he dismissed the Parliament, and their seal too, and as Lord Protector had a new Great Seal engraved, having on the obverse his effigy on horseback, and the inscription, "Olivarius Dei Gratia, Reipublicæ Anglicæ, Scotiæ, et Hiberniæ, &c., Protector." On the reverse were the arms, supporters, helmet, and crest of the three kingdoms, with an escutcheon bearing his own arms in the middle. Instead, however, of the usual arms of England and Scotland, the cross of St. George for England and that of St. Andrew for Scotland were substituted. The inscription on that side was "Magnum Sigillum Reipublicæ Angliæ, Scotiæ, et Hiberniæ," &c. In the unsettled state of things which followed the death of Oliver two more Great Seals were made, one for Richard Cromwell, and, upon his resignation, another for the Rump Parliament; but upon the Restoration their natural order was resumed, and since then the chief occurrence with regard to the Great Seals worthy of notice is that of James II. dropping the Great Seal in the River Thames when making his escape at the time of the Revolution, in order to prevent the possibility of anything being done in his name and under the authority of his seal.

A new Great Seal is always made on the commencement of the present reign is now worn out, having been in use for nearly forty years, and in the life of Lord Campbell that he should be Lord Chancellor at the time when the fortunate longevity of the reign requires a new Great Seal to be made; and fervently is it to be hoped that her Majesty may require further renewals. Impressions from the seals which are delivered to the Lords, as already stated, by squeezing between the seals, under a press, two cakes of wax, softened in hot water, the cord by which the impression is suspended to the document being placed between the two cakes of wax previous to their receiving the impression. The new Great Seal, of which the accompanying Engraving (the same size as the original) is a faithful representation, and which passed the Privy Council a few days ago, is very beautiful, and does the highest credit to the known genius and able execution of Mr. Wyon, of 287, Regent-street, the chief engraver of her Majesty's seals.

The earliest mention of seals which occurs in history is to be found in the Bible. In Genesis, ch. xxxviii. v. 18 and 25, it appears that Judah, the son of Jacob, carried with him a signet. From this it would appear that the art of engraving was known before this time. That such was the case is rendered still more likely from the fact that we have in the British Museum a large number of rings of the ancient Egyptians. As Christianity took root and spread in Rome, and as, after the time of Constantine, the ecclesiastical power began to assume the reins of government, the Bishops of Rome and other Bishops made use of seals in their pastoral and other letters, which afterwards were termed bulls. There are not many seals extant of the period called the dark ages. The seals of Kings and all persons in authority, or who had occasion to use them, were engraved on stones set in gold, and worn as rings, as before, until after the ninth century, but were not used for State purposes after the eleventh century. There is one ring, however, which is still used for such purposes, but that does not belong to those times, as it did not come into use until the fifteenth century. It is the "Annulus piscatoris," "the fisherman's ring," which is worn by the Popes, and is so called because it is engraved with a representation of St. Peter as a fisherman, and is used by the Popes for sealing bulls.

THE BUDGET.

It was no mere figure of speech with which Mr. Gladstone opened his financial statement when he said that public expectation had been keenly and anxiously awaiting the declaration of the mode in which her Majesty's Government proposed to deal with a subject which had acquired an importance that could not be overrated. Seldom, if ever, have all interests and all commercial action been more entirely suspended; nor, indeed, has political movement, not merely in this country but in Europe, often hinged so much on the skill and ability with which the Finance Minister of England should face a condition of things almost, if not wholly, abnormal. The question which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to present to the consideration of the House of Commons was not confined to the internal regulation of the monetary concerns of Great Britain; it was not a question of the remission or imposition of taxes, or the adjustment of the revenue and expenditure of this country, alone with which he had to deal. Intimately and inseparably mixed up with the decision of the fiscal affairs of England for the coming year was a great diplomatic eventuality, on which turns, as we thoroughly believe, the peace of the world and the hope of an amicable settlement of the troubled affairs of the Continent. It was not in the power of the Government to divide the subject of the alliance of this country with France from the question of the commercial treaty, and this latter was necessarily and absolutely part and parcel of any scheme of finance which might be presented to Parliament. On the acceptance or the rejection of this main element of the plan depends the stability of a conjunction between two Powers who, combined, can give the law to the rest of the world, and whose mission, when united on sound principles of policy and social economy, it will be to "teach the nations how to live." A special interest was also attached to the occasion in the fact that the origination and the carrying out of the commercial treaty was the work of a distinguished Englishman to whom his country owes the greatest measure of commercial freedom, with all its boundless consequences of prosperity and tranquility, that was ever wrought out of the moral force of reason and opinion, and who, declining high office in the State, and seeking in foreign travel the restoration of his health, yet found time and energy to devote himself to the elucidation of those commercial principles to the promotion of which his life has been devoted, and won an entrance to the very stronghold of protection and prohibition, doing more in that single act to establish the basis of that system of universal peace, of which, also, he is the recognised apostle, than he had ever attained by any previous efforts in that direction.

As if to force the interest of the occasion up to the culminating point, the official expounder of this great programme of combined policy and finance, from whose eloquence and energy so much of that gratification which surrounds a first-class Parliamentary display was expected, at a critical moment was compelled to succumb to temporary physical incapacity, and for several anxious days one of the most momentous declarations of the last quarter of a century was dangling just out of sight of the peering eyes of a justly curious and anticipative public. The mystery was not one of mere State-craft; the question was not merely that of the fate of a Ministry; but the problem to be solved involved the consideration of the countless blessings of peace to mankind, or the myriad evils of disjointed relations and distracted action of the great Powers of Europe, and perhaps the infinite miseries and horrors of a European war. Let it not be supposed that this is an exaggerated estimate of the consequences which are interwoven, for good or for evil, with the fortune of Mr. Gladstone's Budget. If it meet with acceptance as a whole, it will probably be quite possible to look back at it without detecting any signs that beneath it once lurked such portents as those we have indicated; but we will venture to assert that, if any hostile combination of parties should succeed in causing its rejection, the results which will follow, immediate and direct, will justify any prediction which we have desired to hint rather than positively to declare. The very natural interpellation arises, whether, under such circumstances of high-wrought expectation, did Mr. Gladstone in the propounding of his scheme prove equal to the occasion? We do not believe that we are likely to stand otherwise than in the midst of a multitude of assenting persons whom we take on ourselves to say emphatically that he did.

It seems to us that the Budget comprehended several principles, all of them of prime importance in themselves, and each absolutely indispensable to its integrity as a whole. Mr. Gladstone had, in the first place, to reconcile an exceptional act like that of the commercial treaty with the ordinary ones of free trade; next, to carry out in action the principles of fiscal policy to which this country has long been pledged, and which implies the remission of customs and excise duties, on every available occasion; thirdly, to provide the means necessary for meeting the demand of the public for a thorough organisation of the defences of the country, which implied the adjustment and balancing of revenue and expenditure, and the dealing with any defect which might exist; and, lastly, to bring into consistency the fact of the retention of the income tax with the pledge, for which he was himself responsible, that that impost should be absolutely done away with during the present year. It is on these main points that a decision will have to be taken, separately and collectively, by the Legislature, and on which, during the interval between the publication of the financial plan of the Government and its consideration on Monday next, the country will have to sit in judgment.

It ought not to be forgotten that, in piercing the thick folds of prohibition in France, it was necessary to work by the machinery of the institutions of that country, and it was only in the shape of a commercial treaty that the inauguration of free trade could be brought before the French public. On our side all has been exact and consistent with the principles of unrestricted trade intercourse, and the treaty answers in France to an act of Parliament on the subject in this country. But there is also one merit more than another it is contained in the fact that the Finance Minister, having a sum of two millions odd falling into his hands, and turning aside from the soaring aspect of a large deficit, first dealt with that remission of customs duties on cheese to the population of which he has long professed to act. At once, then, he remitted four millions of taxes, including the duties on a number of articles of prime necessity. Among the abolitions the chief was that of the duty on paper. Condemned by public opinion, and scouted as impolitic and unjust by the House of Commons, the fate of this impost has long been sealed. At the same time all credit should be given to the Minister, who chooses a moment for its remission when, perhaps, it could least have been expected. The effect which it will produce will have on newspapers, literature, and education generally, it is not difficult to estimate; but that is only a part of the question. There is no doubt that the duty has operated as a check on that which might have been a large, affording considerable employment for labour, merely in reference to the price of the raw rags manufactured from rags, but paper of the coarser kinds, which can be produced from other materials, and which are in use in a countless variety of ways. In fact, there is not a tradesman who wraps up a pennyworth of anything that he sells who is not interested in, and will not benefit by, the relinquishment of this fiscal charge. True it is that the duties on tea and sugar remain as they were; and we hear sneers at the retaining of this impost on the poor man's cup while that on the rich man's wine is relieved. It is no use to argue with those who cannot see that this change in our customs charges is only part of the whole alteration of our system of duties on French commodities. But this particular matter is necessarily mixed up with the task cast on Mr. Gladstone to provide for that large expenditure which the country has demanded. Without the present duties on tea and sugar it would not have been possible to meet the estimated demands of the year (which, by-the-by, it should be remembered, are altogether exceptional, and confined, in a great measure, to the present year) without, at least a shilling income tax. In the reliefs which it is proposed to grant the whole nation will insensibly but certainly participate—directly in many instances, and indirectly in the increase of trade, remunerative employment, and the labour which must inevitably follow a further advance in that course of commercial policy from which the country has already gained so much.

We all then, with all these remissions, were asked not only to retain the income tax, but to add to its amount. Does any one seriously suppose that that tax can ever cease to be a part of our financial system? It must be recollected that the first attempt at the introduction of the principles of free trade in this country was accompanied by the imposition of the income tax. If indirect taxation is to pass away there must be a substitute for it; we must choose between direct and indirect taxation. This is a reason why the year 1860 does not witness the redemption of the pledges of 1853: it is only the connection between that pledge and the time for its fulfilment has intervened a great war, the reconstruction of our Navy, the reorganisation of our Army, and, in short, the simple addition of some thirteen millions a year to our expenditure as compared with that of seven years ago. This is not the result of Ministerial jobbing or the recklessness of any one party which has held power in the State. It has been the work alike of Whig, Tory, and Radical in office; it has arisen out of the necessity of the case; and, above all, it has been demanded by the outspoken voice of the country. As a whole, the principles on which the Budget is founded seem to us as just and as equitable as is possible or attainable at a moment like the present. It brings relief to the wealthy, but it also offers many a boon to the humble; and its characteristic element is remission of taxes on the simpler necessities of life, a large stimulus to trade, considerable widening of the field of labour and industry, accompanied by impost for the purposes of preserving the equilibrium between grave but necessary expenditure and income, which fall chiefly, if not entirely, on those who are best able to bear them.

As far as can be ascertained, the opinion of the country has been declared in favour of the Budget. Objections to details, of course, were to be expected. You cannot do a great general right without incurring the chance of doing a little individual wrong. Rumour asserts that this vital measure of the Government is to be opposed by the Conservative party, and by the statesman in particular who has once at least wrecked his Government on a financial scheme. It can hardly be possible that the attack will be direct and aimed at the plan as a whole. To any demonstration in the shape of an airy speech, fluttering with fine abstract sentiments, and to any nibbling with parts and particular points, there can be no objection. Her Majesty's Opposition has a duty to perform; it is its province to criticise, and its function to insinuate dislike. But surely there can be no intention of catching a hostile vote against the Budget pure and simple. Is the country prepared to witness the sorry spectacle of Mr. Disraeli dealing with a surplus of two millions and a half, and Lord Malmesbury manipulating our relations with France?

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

The Empress of the French, on receipt of the news from Tetuan, addressed the following telegraphic despatch to the Queen of Spain:—"I have received the French consulate of Tetuan. Share with all her heart because the triumph of the Spanish arms cannot be indifferent to her." The Queen replied in suitable terms. The Emperor of the French has also congratulated the King Leopold, and his despatch resulted her Majesty in the midst of the Te Deum at the Church of the Atocha. The Epoca, says the Moorish army was scattered on the different roads leading to Fez and Tangier, Marshal O'Donnell continued, in an order of the day, to watch the Moors, and to continue offensive operations until the enemy shall ask mercy of Spain, and until reprisals have been taken for the insults of the army and the blasphemy of the Moors. The Government of Spain A despatch from Tetuan, dated February 1, states that an important engagement took place between the troops under the Marshal O'Donnell had ordered a reconnaissance of the Riff, that the inhabitants had fraternised with the Spanish soldiers, and that the police of Tetuan had been intrusted to a municipality composed of the principal inhabitants.

ITALY.

In a proclamation General Fanti expresses a hope that the carnival at Rome will pass by without any disturbance. He relies on the loyalty of the Romans to prevent any such outbreak as is prohibited, and riotous assemblages will be dispersed.

A Turin letter says:—"I transmit you without delay the resolutions which our Government has adopted with respect to Central Italy. They are these:—The Assemblies of Central Italy at present convoked will be opened in the name of the Provisional Government. A resolution is to be preceded by a manifesto from the King addressed to the populations, which will be a kind of political testament, will be a sort of historical summary of what has taken place in Italy since the preliminaries of Villafranca, and will be followed by the following resolutions:—The wishes of the populations of Etruria and Emilia for a union were spontaneous; it will also call to mind that those wishes have obtained the approbation of the Piedmontese Government. After the publication of this manifesto, which will be a sort of definitive thing pronounced by the nations, the Assembly of Central Italy will take their seats in the Parliament at Turin."

Intelligence received from Naples states that the King has ordered the liberation of political prisoners arrested upon suspicion; those only who are evidently guilty being reserved for trial by the Supreme Tribunal. There is great excitement in Sicily. Letters received announce that the political arrests and the excesses of the police are increasing. Persons have been grossly ill-used, and the political prisoners have been put to the torture, under which some of them died. Several Englishmen have in vain protested against these barbarous acts. A proclamation is now in circulation exhorting the Sicilians to rise in a speedy and general insurrection in order to reinvest Southern Italy with her former rights in Europe. All parties in Sicily are alike favourable to the cessation of despotism. Its above proclamation is said: "Let us hope that Naples will follow our example. The time for moderation has passed away; henceforward there must be daring. Let us rise in the name of Italian nationality, and to the cry of 'Italy and Victor Emmanuel for ever!'"

AUSTRIA.

The reform so promised in the Ministerial programme are about to be granted. Every province will receive a separate constitution and administration, according to the wants of the different nationalities.

On Tuesday the French Ambassador, the Marquis de Moustier, commenced the official reception of the diplomatic body, the Austrian Ministers, and high functionaries. The attachés of the Embassy were present in gala costume.

DENMARK.

The latest news from Denmark is very threatening. The Assembly of the States of Schleswig has decreed the impeachment of Mr. Worlhagen, Minister in a former Cabinet for the Affairs of the Duchies. A series of other propositions of very grave political importance are under consideration in the Assembly, and will probably be adopted, unless a dissolution of the States be proceeded to. But the Danish Government itself is in full dissolution. The Ministry has undertaken the formation of a new Ministry. It is expected that M. Hall, his former colleague, will be intrusted with the portfolio for Foreign Affairs.

PRUSSIA.

The general discussion of the matrimonial law in the First Chamber closed on Wednesday. In the vote on the first two paragraphs all the amendments and the original proposal of the Government were rejected. The First Chamber has, therefore, rejected the civil marriage in every form.

The contest for the Speakership of the House of Representatives, which lasted two months, is at an end. On the last mute, Republican elected by a majority of nine. The New York Herald of the 1st inst. publishes a summary of the report of the United States Secretary of War relative to the relations between England and America concerning the Island of San Juan. The report embraces a large mass of correspondence, and enters fully into the matter in dispute and the settlement effected between General Scott and General Douglas.

The Senate Committee on Commerce have agreed to report Mr. Clay's bill repealing the fishing bounties.

The Boston Board of Trade had adopted a memorial to the President suggesting the tender of the mediation of the United States' Government to England, France, and China, for the amicable adjustment of the difficulties arising out of the battle of the Peiho, and thus avert a war which, entered upon, would inevitably be a protracted and most disastrous one.

Frequent incidents have happened to show or to heighten the bitterness of the hostility aroused between the Northern and Southern States by the Harper's Ferry outbreak and its consequent controversies. A man summoned before the Committee appointed by the Senate to report on Harper's Ferry insurrection has refused to give evidence, and will, it is said, be brought to answer for his contempt at the bar of the Senate. Letters more persons supposed to hold anti-slavery opinions have been expelled from Kentucky; and a bill introduced into the Texan Legislature proposes to provide for the imprisonment of Northern preachers, teachers, and commercial travellers. A man named Mitch ell, who has been convicted of aiding a slave to escape from Missouri into Illinois, has been sentenced to be hanged at Charleston on the 2nd of March.

On the 2nd inst. a fire broke out in Elm-street, by which fifty persons perished. The Mayor of Brooklyn has offered a reward of fifty. The explosion was caused by the bursting of a boiler. Fifteen of the workmen were killed on the spot. By a new entire fire in New York Mr. Bonner, the proprietor of the Ledger, has lost 30,000 dollars' worth of property, including 80,000 Ledgers ready for sale.

Washington's birthday was the 22nd inst. The festivities took place in the square between Washington and Georgetown, will be inaugurated on the 22nd inst. The Prince of Wales will deliver an address. The masons and the military will parade.

In the forts were not agreed among themselves, and the Imperial troops had been victorious over them.

European men-of-war were off the mouth of the Peiho.

The British Minister in Mexico had address and an ultimatum to the Mexican Government regarding the British claims.

The citizens of Geneva have sent an address to the Federal Council of Switzerland containing a protest against the annexation of Savoy to France.

The Prussian journals relate an extraordinary affair. In the midst of the celebration of Divine service in the church of Brück, near Potsdam, a few days ago, a young man named Franz Bürk, and whose name persons hurried to the place they were astounded to find that the Dane, who had been the cause of causing some of the prayers, had stabbed the principal clergyman of the church five times with a large hunting knife, and was then engaged with his sword in attempting to murder the assistant arrested. The journals do not state the cause of this attempt, either; neither do they say if the wounds of the pastor are serious.

MEXICO.—The following telegrams from New Orleans contain late Mexican intelligence:—Affairs at Vera Cruz were quiet. Detachments of marines have been landed from the English, French, and Miramon detention of American citizens, in consequence of Miramon's threatened expulsion to the coast of Vera Cruz. Orders were given to all troops that the Seamen was expected daily. Advices from the city of Mexico are to the 19th inst. Miramon was preparing an expedition against Degollado, then at Tlaxcala. The clergy raise Miramon funds for his Vera Cruz expedition, considering it a war against heretics. Miramon would start on the 20th. A proclamation by Miramon again protests against the M Lane treaty. The British Minister had presented his ultimatum, demanding indemnity. The Liberals have retaken all the Pacific ports captured by Miramon.

NEW ZEALAND.—We have received intelligence from Auckland to the 20th of November, from Wellington and Hervey Bay to the 22nd, and arrived—the former on the 3rd of November, the latter on the 11th of November. From a summary of the contents of the Auckland papers for the November mail, we extract the following particulars:—The election for the Provincial Council had taken place, and were in favour of provincial Executive. There was no probability of the existing land regulations being disturbed. The Government had offered for sale on favourable special settlements, two at Mongonui, and the third, numbering 50 lots, at Port Nicholson. The latter published 1,000 acres, that at Mangonui, containing 5,836 acres, having excellent water communication with the Kaipara. The Government had also intimated its intention to call attention from the Government agent (Mr. Lush), who is very anxious that valuable information should result. Englishmen for the above purposes wishing to proceed to New Zealand. Mr. Lush having had placed in his hands a letter addressed by a Manchester firm to a Wellington merchant, written a letter in reply, which is printed in the New Zealander, and from which we make the following extract:—"The country will have to be very healthy one—I do believe one of the healthiest in the world; and I know no reason why emigrants of fifty years of age should not do well along with the younger members of their families. They would be more likely to succeed than persons in the middle class of life, as I do not think that in ordinary seasons any inconvenience will be felt from the climate."

WEST COAST OF AFRICA.—LIVERPOOL, Feb. 11.—The screw steamer Conquest, Captain Commander, has arrived from the West Coast of Africa, &c., with the usual mails, ten passengers, including Commissary-General Gold, and specie to the amount of £2,000. She left Cape Coast Castle on Sunday, Dec. 30; Lagos, Jan. 10; Cape Coast, Jan. 12. The Africa steamer left Cape Coast on the 30th ult. Everything religious and political and that was numbers of people flocked to the House of God twice every day. Her Majesty's ship Arrogant, Commodore Hand, was on the coast, the barque Orion, with between 400 and 500 slaves on board. The palm-oil trade on the rivers was stopped. On the 31st of Oct. a civil war broke out in Town and Creek Town people was feared. The punier reports the gold trade as being very dull. The native produce was very indifferent, but it was expected to be a fair one. The people in Cape Coast had been fighting among themselves. Every article was extremely scarce. Mr. Chubbock had been sent on board a man-of-war to be taken to Quittah as a prisoner for two years. The native customs were very indignant, and threatened to break out again. In the interior of the Fantee country a district called Akwah was again in a disturbed state, the people of a town called Doompoah having expressed their determination no longer to submit to the Otou King of the district. The fine imposed on the Chubbocs of 10,000 pots of palm-oil (the pot of nine gallons) had not been paid. Crabbee is the district of the Gold Coast settlement. The fine was imposed by the British Government on the Chubbocs in November, 1858, to pay the expenses of an expedition undertaken by the Government against the Chubbocs to enforce obedience. A movement was on foot to cultivate cotton. Six bales had been shipped at Accra for England. The chiefs of Accra were imprisoned on the 16th of January for not having paid the amount of the indemnity decreed for the ravages made by the mob at Accra on the French factory in that town in January, 1858.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

Marshal O'Donnell has replied that the Queen alone has the power to fix the conditions of peace. He has, however, sent a messenger to Madrid on the subject. The public spirit in Spain is warlike. The Queen has presided at a Council of Ministers. Their Majesties have left for Aranjuez.

Vienna, Thursday.—The Oesterreichische Zeitung announces positively that the answer of Count Rechburg to the despatch of M. Thouvenel has not yet been given. The same journal contradicts the statement that the Prince von Hessen proceeds to St. Petersburg on any extraordinary mission.

Dresden, Thursday.—The official Dresden journal publishes a telegram dated St. Petersburg the 16th inst., announcing that Russia has rejected the English proposal for the settlement of the affairs of Italy.

Constantinople, Feb. 7 (viâ Marseilles).—A change in the Ministry is spoken of; it is said that the Grand Vizier will be replaced by Kyprish Pacha, and Fuad Pacha by Ethem Pacha. Discontent is increasing in the provinces of the empire. Protestant missionaries have left for the interior. The Turkish army has heard with satisfaction the renewal of the Anglo-French alliance.

India and China.—Through the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company we learn that the Alhambra, with the Calcutta and China mails, arrived at Marseilles at noon on Thursday. Mails left for London a three p.m. Letters will be delivered this (Saturday) morning.

A great meeting of the Roman Catholics of Birmingham and the neighbourhood was held on Tuesday in the Townhall, when an address of sympathy to the Pope in his present difficulties was adopted. Viscount Feilding occupied the chair, and Bishop Ullathorne was one of the principal speakers. It is estimated that about 6000 persons were present.

A terrible accident occurred on Wednesday at one of the Messrs. Charlesworth's collieries at Higham, near Barnsley. Fourteen men and boys were engaged in one of the workings, when an explosion of firedamp, the cause of which is not known, took place, killing eleven of the colliers and injuring the remaining three to a very serious extent.

Wreck of the "Sir Henry Pottinger."—In consequence the report of the magistrates and Captain Harris, nautical assessor, who recently held an inquiry at Swansea into the circumstances attending the wreck of the barque Sir Henry Pottinger in Carmarthen Bay, the Board of Trade have directed the suspension of her captain's certificate for twelve months.

A Fire broke out on Thursday se'nnight at Alloa in the mill belonging to Messrs. Paton and Sons, the manufacturers of the well-known "Alloa stocking yarns." In about half an hour the whole building was in a blaze, and ultimately burned to the ground. The loss, which is fully covered by insurance, is estimated at from £10,000 to £15,000. A great number of hands will be thrown out of employment.

A great fire took place on Tuesday night at Hanmer's buildings, Park-street, Bristol. The entire damage is variously estimated at from £10,000 to £15,000. The principal sufferer is Mr. Kerslake, bookseller, whose stock of books and manuscripts is said to have been probably one of the most rare, extensive, and costly to be found out of London. Only about half the stock, valued at £20,000, and which was but partially insured, is saved.

At the Court of Common Pleas, on Thursday (before Lord Chief Justice Erle and a special jury), the case of Gye v. Hughes, which was part heard the previous day, was resumed. It was an action brought by Mr. F. Gye, the lessee of Covent-garden Theatre, to recover £5000 rent paid in advance for her Majesty's Theatre in the Haymarket for one year, as part of a term leased to him by agreement, which had not been performed, dated in March, 1853, together with interest on that sum, and £459 paid for insurance of the house. The defendant pleaded various pleas, denying his liability. At the conclusion of the evidence the jury intimated they were quite satisfied that the plaintiff's case was made out. The learned Judge was therefore relieved from the difficulty of summing up, and a verdict was entered for the plaintiff—damages £5000.

Affairs of Italy.—The correspondence respecting the affairs of Italy from the signature of the preliminaries of Villafranca to the postponement of the Congress was published on Wednesday. It is contained in a bulky book of 275 pages, and there are 252 diplomatic documents, the earliest in date being July 13, 1859, and the latest January 8, 1860. The correspondence relates in some part to several points now settled, and gives rather lengthened narratives of proceedings in Central Italy last year, fully reported in the newspapers at the time. Many of the diplomatic proceedings have also been already reported to the House by Lord John Russell. We may here refer to one point which comes out at the end of the correspondence. Lord John Russell had written to Sir J. Hudson as to the interference and terrorism which Sardinia was reported to have created in the Duchies and the Romagna. Sir J. Hudson replies that after the peace of Villafranca the Piedmontese Government recalled every one of its soldiers, and did nothing to provoke antagonism. If all who advocated annexation to Piedmont, says Sir J. Hudson, were the paid agents of Piedmont, as had been stated, the Piedmontese treasury would long ago have become insolvent.

Honduras.—The New York Herald publishes the text of the convention recently negotiated between Great Britain and Honduras for the return of the Bay Islands to Honduras, and for the surrender to the Mosquito Protectorate over that part of the Mosquito shore falling within the rightful territorial jurisdiction of that Republic. The convention is a revision of the two conventions signed in London in 1856 by Lord Clarendon and Senor Victor Herran, as representative of Honduras, and which the Government of the Republic refused to accept. In the new convention the importance of securing the neutrality of the Bay Islands, as well as the territory of the mainland adjacent, "with reference to any railway or other route of communication which may be constructed across the territory of Honduras," is made the ostensible object of the surrender of the islands. Special care seems to have been taken to avoid making the act of surrender in any way a recognition of the existing or antecedent rights of Honduras over the island. The convention provides for an arbitration of existing claims of British subjects on Honduras.

Funeral of the Grand Duchess of Baden.—The funeral of the Grand Duchess Stéphanie of Baden took place on the 7th instant at Pforzheim. The Grand Duke of Baden, accompanied by the Prince Royal of Saxony, Prince de Hohenzollern and his four sons, Prince Joachim Murat, General Roguet, the Duke of Hamilton and his two sons, the Prince de Leinengen, Prince William of Baden, as well as the French, Wurtemberg, and Hessian Ministers, arrived at Pforzheim at eleven o'clock in the morning. After having been present at a religious service performed in the Roman Catholic chapel of the town, where the coffin had been deposited the previous night, the Grand Duke, acting as chief mourner, accompanied on foot the remains of the deceased to the Protestant chapel of the palace, where the coffin was placed by the side of that of the Grand Duke Charles, her husband, in a vault which will be henceforth closed up. In the course of the ceremony the Minister of Finance read a biographical notice of the Grand Duchess. On the following day a mass was celebrated at ten o'clock, with great solemnity, in the Roman Catholic church of Carlsruhe, for the repose of the soul of the deceased Stéphanie, in presence of the Grand Duke, the Grand Duchess, and all the princes and personages assembled on the occasion.

How a Toad Undresses.—A gentleman sent to the New England Farmer an amusing description of "how a toad takes off his coat and pants." He says he has seen one do it, and a friend has seen another do the same thing in the same way :—"About the middle of July I found a toad on a hill of melons, and, not wanting him to leave, I hoed around him ; he appeared sluggish, and not inclined to move. Presently I observed him pressing his elbows hard against his sides, and rubbing downwards. He appeared so singular, that I watched to see what he was up to. After a few smart rubs, his skin began to burst open, straight along his back. Now, said I, old fellow, you have done it ; but he appeared to be unconcerned, and kept on rubbing until he had worked all his skin into folds on his sides and hips ; then, grasping one hind leg with both his hands, he hauled off one leg of his pants the same as anybody would, then stripped the other hind leg in the same way. He then took this cast-off cuticle forward, between his fore legs, into his mouth, and swallowed it ; then, by raising and lowering his head, swallowing as his head came down, he stripped off the skin underneath, until it came to his fore legs, and then, grasping one of these with the opposite hand, by considerable pulling, stripped off the skin ; changing hands, he stripped the other, and, by a slight motion of the head, and all the while swallowing, he drew it from the neck and swallowed the whole. The operation seemed an agreeable one, and occupied but a short time." (From the New York Independent, December 29, 1859).—From "Notes and Queries."

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

A man named Barnes, while driving a waggon underneath an archway in Little Stanhope-street, Mayfair, on Wednesday morning, was crushed between the load in his waggon and the top of the arch. He was frightfully injured, and died on his way to the hospital.

An extensive conflagration broke out on Tuesday morning in a large range of premises in the joint occupation of Mr. G. Stanbury, manufacturer of printer's ink, Messrs. Crow and Barwick, machine-rulers, and Mr. Strong, stereotype-founder, Great New-street, Fetter-lane, London. The premises were destroyed, and those of Mr. Macintosh, printer, were slightly damaged.

An encyclical letter from the Pope was read publicly on Sunday, at high mass, in the Roman Catholic places of worship in London and its vicinity, expressing the thanks of his Holiness for the prayers and sympathy of the faithful in England, and of his earnest desire for their continued support in the impending struggle. The Pope assured his flock that he is ready, if necessary, to die in defence of the rights of the Church and of the see of St. Peter.

Walworth Working Men's Institution.—On Tuesday night the public annual meeting of the Walworth Working Men's Institution was held at the Clayton School-room, York-street—Lord Charles Russell (Sergeant-at-Arms) in the chair. Mr. Selway, secretary of the institution, read the report, which gave a gratifying account of the condition and progress of the institution. The meeting was addressed by the Revs. G. T. Cotham, F. F. Statham, P. J. Turquand, &c.

Lectures on Fossil Mammalia.—Professor Owen delivered the second lecture of his course on fossil mammalia on the afternoon of yesterday week at the Museum of Practical Geology, Jermyn-street. Having in the preceding lecture explained the characteristics of the four principal groups of living mammals, as distinguished by their cerebral developments, he proceeded on Friday to consider the distinguishing features of the extinct mammalia that existed in former worlds, and to point out the means by which the comparative anatomist can ascertain from the form of a single bone the character, the habits, and even the form of the animal when living.

Fatal Occurrence.—On Sunday night Mrs. Groom, St. George's-terrace, St George's-in-the-East, was in the act of pulling open the table drawer, when the end of her dress became ignited, and she was unaware of what had taken place until she became encircled in flames. Her cries for help brought her husband to her assistance, and he did all he possibly could to subdue the fire but without effect. Three neighbours then rushed into the house. All three were much burnt, and were obliged to have medical assistance. Mrs. Groom died at the London Hospital on the following day.

Royal London Ophthalmic Hospital.—On Tuesday, the annual meeting of the governors of this institution was held in the board-room of the hospital, Blomfield-street, Moorfields—Mr. W. Cotton presided. From the report it appears that, during the last twelve months, 10,407 out-patients and 12,111 in-patients have been relieved, being a large increase on the general average. The report stated that the expiration of the Long Annuities has caused the cessation of a large annual source of income, and the committee therefore strongly appeal for the continued support and sympathy of the public for sustaining the usefulness of the charity. The report was adopted, the officers of the institution were re-elected, and the vacancies filled up.

Births and Deaths.—Last week the births of 1030 boys and 991 girls (in all 2021 children) were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1850-59 the average number was 1721.——The mortality in London has risen, apparently in consequence of the cold weather. The deaths were less than 1390 in each of the two previous weeks. In the week that ended last Saturday they were 1442. In the ten years 1850-59 the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week was 1188. The deaths exceeded the corrected average by 136. A labourer died from apoplexy, caused by inhaling the vapours of spirit in a rum-vault in the London Docks. Seven persons died at the age of 90 years and upwards, and amongst these was a widow in the Marylebone workhouse, who had attained the age of 100.

London Orphan Asylum.—The annual festival of this institution was held on Tuesday evening at the London Tavern. The objects of the society, and the manner in which they were carried out, were admirably illustrated by the appearance of the 420 children under the protection of the charity, who, according to custom, were introduced during the dinner. The Vice-Chancellor, Sir W. Page Wood, presided. From the report it appeared that since the last meeting seventy-two children had been admitted into the asylum. Not the least interesting feature of the evening was the exhibition of two busts and a statue of "Evangeline," by Mr. Miller, formerly a pupil in the London Orphan Asylum, and now professor of modeling and sculpture in the South Kensington Museum. The subscriptions during the evening amounted to £1845.

The Late Dr. Todd.—On Wednesday a meeting of gentlemen connected with King's College, and private friends of the late Dr. Todd, was held in the library of the college, to consider the most suitable means for perpetuating the memory of the deceased gentleman in connection with the college and the hospital. Mr. Cotton, treasurer of the college, took the chair, and, having briefly explained the object of the meeting, read a letter from the Bishop of Lichfield, paying a high tribute to the character of Dr. Todd, and expressed his satisfaction at the steps about to be taken to preserve his memory. The Rev. Principal Jelf moved a resolution in furtherance of the object of the meeting, and, after some observations from Mr. Cheere, some discussion followed, and it was subsequently determined that a statue of Dr. Todd should be erected in the hospital, and a Todd clinical gold medal be founded as a prize. A committee was formed, and about £150 subscribed in the room.

Hospital for Sick Children.—The eighth annual meeting of the governors of this institution was held on Tuesday, at the board-room, Great Ormond-street, Queen's-square—Mr. Labouchere presided. The report, read by the secretary, stated that the receipts were greatly in advance of any previous year. The house expenditure and all other charges and disbursements, deducted from the receipts, left a balance of £413 15s. 6d. The wards of the hospital were constantly full, and increased accommodation was urgently required. The out-patients for the past year were 9867, and the in-patients 411. The total number of out-patients since the establishment of the institution was 56,969; in-patients, 2274. The parents of the poor children in the hospital had contributed in pence towards the Samaritan fund £86 2s. 4d. The Home for Convalescent Children at Mitcham, founded by Lady Harding, and still under her management, was referred to by the committee in terms of the highest praise ; and the Model Nursery at No. 48 had fully answered the anticipations of its promoters. The presidents, vice-presidents, and other officers of the institution were re-elected.

Proposed Opening of the British Museum on Sunday.—On Monday an influential deputation, composed of upwards of 200 noblemen, members of Parliament, clergymen, ministers, and gentlemen of various Protestant denominations, waited upon the Prime Minister to urge him strenuously to oppose every motion for opening secular institutions on the Sabbath. Lord Palmerston (speaking with much emphasis) said he had been sorry to see the notice of motion by Sir John Trelawny, because he thought the question had been disposed of by what had formerly passed. The House of Commons, representing the feeling of the country, had given strong and decisive expression to their disapproval of a former motion to the same effect. There could be no doubt as to the feelings of the Government on this question. They could not agree to the motion, and would meet it either by a direct negative or by moving the "previous question," as might seem expedient. The deputation might rest perfectly satisfied on the subject. The Earl of Shaftesbury expressed the cordial thanks of the deputation for the bold and manly way in which the noble Premier had expressed himself, adding, "That is the way to govern the people of England."

St. George's-in-the-East.—In consequence of the admission of the police on Sunday last to the Church of St. George-in-the-East—which for some time past has been, from the outrages perpetrated in it, a scandal to public decency—but little disturbance took place. As soon as the church doors were thrown open on Sunday morning a body of fifty policemen, headed by Mr. Superintendent Howie, marched into the church, and stood in twelves, in four rows—namely, twelve in the north and twelve in the south side of the nave, twelve in the south aisle, and twelve in the north. The other two guarded the altar. The Litany service in the afternoon passed off more quietly than usual. Prior to the commencement of the evening service an immense mass of persons assembled in Cannon-street, and it was with great difficulty that the police could keep them back. When the procession of priests and choristers entered the church there was a good deal of hissing and coughing, but the presence of the police, as in the morning, prevented any violent outbreak. Mr. Rosier, clothier, of St. George-street (Ratcliff-highway), who has been cited by the Rev. Bryan King, the Rector to the Consistory Court, has been served with the copy of "articles," calling upon him to answer charges of brawling in the parish church of St. George-in the-East.——A deputation, consisting of the Rector of Stepney ; the Chaplain of Lincoln's-inn ; Mr. Thomas Hughes, and Mr. T. R. Bennett, barristers ; Mr. F. B. Baker, Scots Fusilier Guards ; Mr. J. M. Ludlow, and Mr. J. Maconochie, barristers, waited at the Home Office on Tuesday, to present a memorial signed by upwards of 2000 clergy and laity of London, on the subject of these riots. The deputation suggested that, if the law were not sufficient to meet the emergency, a short declaratory Act should be passed, and, if the law were already sufficient, it should be rigorously enforced.——A case arising out of the riotous disturbances in this church on Sunday, the 5th inst., brought before Mr. Yardley, at the Thames Police Court, has broken down, and the defendant, Mr. Mitchenson, a shipwright, has been discharged, on the ground of conflicting evidence as to identity.

William Jenkins, LL.D., Matthew O'Donnell, and Charles Hare Hemphill, Esqrs., were called to the Inner Bar by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland at the sitting of the Court of Chancery on Saturday, the 11th of February inst.

William Scandling, a ticket-collector on the London and Greenwich line, was killed on Sunday night by his head coming in contact with a signal-post as he was going from one carriage to another while the train was in motion.

The Weather and the Parks.—This heading, owing to the severe frost which set in at the early part of the week, again made its appearance in the daily papers. The waters in the several Royal parks became frozen over, and skates were once more in active requisition. Numbers of persons, in all the parks, had cold baths through the breaking of the ice, but were rescued by the Humane Society's men, several of whom suffered severely for their exertions. The accidents in St. James's Park, owing to the shallowness of the water, were rather a source of amusement than of danger. Five or six skaters were immersed on Tuesday in the Serpentine, and in one case—that of Mr. Gard, of Chelsea—all efforts to restore animation were fruitless. A youth named Reeves, the son of a school-teacher, was drowned in one of the Hampstead ponds through the ice giving way on Monday.

St. Giles and St. George's Ragged Schools.—The annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of this institution was held on Wednesday evening at the Music Hall, Store-street, Bedford-square—Mr. Robert Hanbury, M.P., in the chair. The report stated that in the boys' refuge in Great Queen-street, 105 had been admitted during the past year. The total number of children admitted into the refuges up to the end of 1859 had been 781—viz., 469 boys and 312 girls. The total number who had left the institution up to the same date had been 506, comprising 257 boys and 249 girls. The majority of these had emigrated. The next greatest number had been placed in situations, many had entered the naval and merchant service, and many others had been restored to their friends. In the girls' refuge 56 had been admitted during the past year from ragged schools, 17 admitted on the application of friends, three had been found in the streets by the secretary, six brought by missionaries, and two sent by clergymen. The ragged-school operations and other works of usefulness for the benefit of the poor had been carried on at 8, Great Queen-street; and 19, Broad-street, Neal's-yard; and Little Coram-street. At 19, Broad-street, in addition to the refuge work, the following operations had been carried on—a girls' day school and night school, and infant school, Sunday school for children, open three times every Sunday; a mothers' meeting, a fathers' meeting, lectures to working men, Working Men's Benefit Club and Provident Funds. According to the finance statement the total receipts from all sources, including the balance at the last audit, had been £5435 5s. 3½d., and the total payments £2645 7s. 8d. The report was adopted. Resolutions expressive of thankfulness for the good the institution had effected were then passed. The meeting was addressed by the chairman, the Rev. J. Graham, Mr. G. Fordham, Mr. Ware, and other gentlemen.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Bishop of Columbia left San Francisco on December 29, in good health and spirits, fully hoping to reach his diocese within three or four days from that date.

The Ten New Churches at Bradford.—Another of the ten new churches at Bradford, for which designs have already been executed, will be erected at Little Horton Green, at the sole cost (£6000 or £7000) of Mr. Francis Sharp Powell, of Horton Hall, and of Wigan, Lancashire.

Consecration of Churches.—On Thursday week the Bishop of London consecrated the new Church of St. Luke, Holloway. The Bishop of Sierra Leone and a large number of the parochial clergy were present. The site was a gift of the late Mr. T. Poynder, his son, Mr. J. Poynder, having also given a donation of £500, and the late Mr. A. Batson, the proprietor of the adjoining estate, £1000. There are sittings for 1300, 560 free. The Rev. G. A. Rogers is the Incumbent.——The Bishop of London consecrated the Church of St. Bartholomew, Gray's-inn-road, on Monday. The church is a very old structure, and has been for some years past in connection with the Church of England. Formerly it was called "Providence Chapel," and was under the ministry of the celebrated William Huntington, who, having no collegiate degree, appended S.S. to his name, the letters implying "Sinner Saved." Afterwards the chapel was held by the Rev. Thomas Mortimer, B.D. ; and, now that it has become a district church of the parish of St. Pancras, it is under the ministerial charge of the Rev. E. Gartlett, M.A., of Brasenose College, Oxford.——A new church was consecrated at Tong, near Dudley-hill, by the Bishop of Ripon, on Tuesday week. The building contains 500 sittings, one half of which are free. On the same day his Lordship also consecrated the new cemetery.

The Convocation of the Prelates and Clergy of the Province of Canterbury assembled on Tuesday for the transaction of business—the Bishops in Queen Anne's Bounty Office, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury ; and the Lower House in the Jerusalem Chamber, the Very Reverend the Dean of Bristol presiding in the Lower House as Prolocutor. There was a large attendance of each branch of the Convocation. In the Upper House, on Tuesday, the Bishop of Lincoln presented a petition from a considerable number of his clergy, pointing out the many evils which resulted from the obligation to have sponsors in baptism. This question was discussed at great length, and there was a general impression that the canon which made it obligatory to have sponsors in baptism, and which prevented parents from presenting their own children, required alteration. A discussion took place in the Lower House on Tuesday respecting the proposed revision of the Prayer-book. Canon Wordsworth moved a resolution approving the opposition carried on against Lord Ebury's movement, and expressing a hope that the Liturgy would "ever be accepted and approved by all peaceable and conscientious sons of the Church of England." The Dean of Norwich, Dr. M'Caul, Canon Selwyn, Mr. Jebb, Mr. Oxenden, and the Dean of Ely objected to the motion, and ultimately the "previous question" was carried.

Testimonials.—At a meeting held on Tuesday evening in the National Schoolroom, Cheadle, a silver salver and a baptismal bowl were presented to the Rev. C. J. Cummings, M.A., Rector of Cheadle ; the former being the gift of the working-class portion of his congregation, and the latter the offering of the teachers and scholars in the Sunday School. The total value of the testimonials amounted to about £30.——The ladies occupying sittings at St. James's Church, Clerkenwell, have presented to the Rev. Robert Maguire a copy of Bagster's "Biblical Commentary," and a purse of thirty guineas for the purchase of a gold watch, together with a church service, as a token of esteem for Mrs. Maguire.——The parishioners of St. Dunstan's-in-the-West, London, have presented to the Rev. A. B. Suter, M.A., the former Curate (now, on the nomination of the Bishop of London, Incumbent of All Saints', Stepney) a handsome testimonial in the shape of a tea and coffee service in silver, and a bronze timepiece, accompanied by an address illuminated on vellum, and framed and glazed.

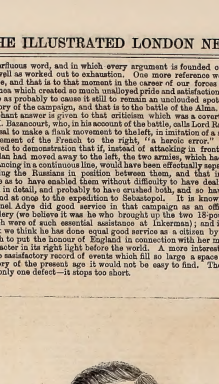
LITERATURE.

TRAVELS IN EASTERN AFRICA. By LYONS MCLEOD, Esq., F.R.G.S., late her Majesty's Consul at Mozambique. Hurst and Blackett.

This is a very valuable contribution to the acquirement of knowledge of a quarter of the globe which has of late years assumed an importance, from a commercial point of view, which can hardly be overrated. Mr. McLeod is one of the lay missionaries who, believing that civilisation and Christianity are best promoted by commerce, has devoted himself to efforts to do away with slavery from the continent of Africa. This he endeavours to carry out, not by doing by the establishment of commercial relations by a country like ours with that rich portion of the African coast, and the neighbouring Ethiopian archipelago, including the fertile island of Madagascar, which he has described in the volumes before us. In December, 1858, Mr. McLeod left England for the Cape of Good Hope on his way to Mozambique, to which place he had been appointed her Majesty's Consul. The early chapters of the first volume are devoted to a description of the shortcomings, and something more, connected with the steam-postal service to the Cape, which would be amusing if it did not imply a very serious question, in reference to the efficiency, and even safety, of the service. How it may be now we cannot say, but, if the contrast is no better fulfilled now than it was then, any attention that Mr. McLeod's work may draw to the subject will not be among the least of its merits. A long detention at the Cape enabled our author to see and know something of the place of colonial life there, and his subsequent voyage towards his ultimate destination gave him an opportunity of visiting Natal, the Zulu country, the Zambesi River, and, indeed, a large space of African territory, from his inspection of which he has gathered materials for ten or twelve chapters of his book, which are so various as to give the narrative a likeness to one of those rolling dioramas that were prevalent as exhibitions awhile ago, and which carried the spectator, say, down the whole course of the Mississippi in half an hour, by means of a succession of well-painted pictures. At length, in July, 1857, the seat of Mr. McLeod's duties was reached, and he was formally received by the Portuguese Governor of Mozambique, and immediately we have a sketch of men and manners and an insight into the state of slavery. Even in these days of literary institutions and competitive examinations it may not be wholly superfluous to quote Mr. McLeod so far as to hint that Mozambique, when reached by Vasco di Gama, in 1498, was an Arab settlement under the dominion of the Sultan of Kilwa, the latter being then one of the most celebrated ports of the country, having vessels which had constant commercial relations with Arabia, Persia, and India. The subsequent history of that settlement, its conquest by the Portuguese, and all the changes to which it was subjected, we are promised in another work, which will shortly appear. The city of Mozambique, placed as it is on an island of the same name, which, with two others—St. Jago and St. George—lying in an inlet of the Indian Oceano, forms, with the mainland, a secure harbour, five miles deep and five miles and a quarter broad; and, with the neighbouring harbour of Mokambo, in which three rivers discharge themselves, is stated by Mr. McLeod to be, perhaps, the most eligible spot to establish an immense trade with the interior, and an admirable position for an emporium for Europe, America, Arabia, India, and Madagascar. The advantages of the harbour for commercial purposes, both as to its means of communicating with the vast interior of Africa and the facilities offered by the resources for easy access to the neighbouring countries, are stated to be too striking and obvious to be overrated. In the opinion of our author it only requires the entire cessation of the slave trade to make the capabilities of this magnificent harbour known, when the development of its rich and varied resources would obtain for it a position as an entrepôt for the commerce of the world second only to that of Alexandria. It would be easy to expand a sentence of this work almost indefinitely, for each chapter is so full of incident, and the style is so pleasantly sustained, without the least forcing, that the reader is not conscious of any desire for pause or check. Of the merits of the work, in connection with a grand social question which is every day acquiring more prominence in reference to the mercantile transactions of the world and of this country in particular, there can be no doubt; while even its value merely as the elaborated diary of a traveller it would take no mean rank.



A REVIEW OF THE CRIMEAN WAR TO THE WINTER OF 1854–5. By Lieutenant-Colonel JOHN ADYE, C.B., late Assistant Adjutant-General, Royal Artillery. Hurst and Blackett.

It has been said that the true history of the Crimean War has yet to be written. Towards the perfecting of this history we think that Colonel Adye has, in the work before us, very materially contributed. It may, perhaps, be objected that the Crimean War is an old story, but we believe that the lesson it taught and the influence it has exercised, to say nothing of the vast amount of misunderstanding which sprung out of and around it, are scarcely appreciated as they must always invest any narrative belonging to that period with interest and with value. Colonel Adye informs us that the work before us was first written in 1857, but owing to his departure for service in India the publication was then delayed, while his continued detention abroad has caused a curtailment of his narrative. As far as it goes it seems to us to bear the impress of truth and knowledge of the subject, and to give correct information on many points hitherto much misrepresented. Perhaps no better defence of all those who were concerned in the conduct of that famous expedition could be found than the book we have before us. A casual glance, the first error was the fruitful mother of all the rest; and in this case the first step, which produced the rest of all the others, was that England undertook a great war with a military establishment hardly adequate to the ordinary guard-mounting of her peace time. In a single calculation of Colonel Adye is to be found the gist of the whole question. He says :—

In order to maintain an army of, say, 20,000 men in the field, the following are some of the more important requisites :—20,000 trained soldiers ready to land; half-a-dozen regiments of cavalry; 30,000 men to attend to General Staff, Medical Staff, Commissariat Staff, to consist of officers thoroughly acquainted with their duties, and assisted by the concentration of troops; transportation for the conveyance of food for the army, reserve ammunition for the infantry, cavalry, and artillery, camp equipage, hospital medical stores, and the sick and wounded, pontoon train, engineers' stores, &c., siege train. Now, what was the state of the British army sent to the East in 1854? One might almost put the pen through every item except the first. When the 26,000 men had left England the country was almost drained of its soldiers; of reserves, consequently, there were next to none.

As a proof of the requirements of a force more or less prepared for a campaign it is only necessary to quote another statement of Colonel Adye, from which we learn that the strength of the Land Transport Corps attached to the British Army in the Crimea when peace was signed was as follows :—English and native drivers, 14,000; animals, 28,000; waggons, 800; carts, 1000; whereas, when the war began, the department was represented by the expressive figure—0!

It is only in our power to give a taste of the quality of this very able and satisfactory book, in which, to our mind, there is not a superfluous word, and in which every argument is founded on fact, as well as worked out to exhaustion. One more reference we must make, and that is to that moment in the career of our forces in the Crimea which created so much unalloyed pride and satisfaction at the time as probably to cause it still to remain an unclouded spot in the history of the campaign, and that is to the battle of the Alma. A triumphant answer is given to that criticism which was a covert sneer of H. Bonaparte, who, in his account of the battle, says that Lord Raglan's refusal to make a flank movement to theleft, in imitation of a similar movement of the French to the right, "a heroic error." It is proved to demonstration that if, instead of attacking in front, Lord Raglan had moved away to the left, the two armies, which had been advancing in continuous order, would have been effectually separated, leaving the Russians in position between them, and that in such force as to have enabled them without difficulty to have dealt with each in detail, and probably to have crushed both, and so have put an end at once to the expedition to Sebastopol. It is known that Colonel Adye did a good service in that campaign as an officer of artillery (we believe it was he who brought up the two 18-pounders which were of such essential assistance at Inkerman); and in this book we think he has done equal good service as a citizen by doing much to put the honour of England in connection with her military character in its right light before the world. A more interesting or more satisfactory record of events which fill so large a space in the history of the present age it would not be easy to find. The book has only one defect—it stops too short.

THE HON. A. T. GALT, FINANCE MINISTER OF CANADA.

OLD LEAVES GATHERED FROM "HOUSEHOLD WORDS." By W. H. WILLS. Chapman and Hall.

The readers of the weekly publication entitled Household Words often found themselves struck by the fecundity of Mr. Charles Dickens, which they believed to be apparent in the pages of that serial. After a time, however, it came to be known that by a process not unnatural, or wholly to be unexpected, some of his immediate coadjutors had consciously, or unconsciously, as the case might be, fallen into the track of his style and manner so completely that it was not easy to distinguish the productions of the master from those of the pupils. The publication of the work before us (which is a collection of papers from Household Words) shows that Mr. Wills has been the most successful, we will not say imitator, but producer of the school of Mr. Dickens. The exercise of the mimetic power in literature, as in other things, is generally a dangerous one, inasmuch as it is a faculty much more likely to serve upon the feeble than the merits of a model. It is well venture to say that in the present instance that error has been avoided. If Mr. Wills in every paper has wrought out his materials and manipulated his style as to lay him open to the charge of having imitated Mr. Dickens, we will venture to assert that he has done so very much as Raphael imitated Perugino. There are essays and tales in this collection which exhibit a power of observation and a quickness of perception which Mr. Dickens himself might envy, and which display a sense of humour and a sustaining power of banter and pleasantry which, we are of opinion, are characteristics of the gentleman since the great Pickwick period. If it were consistent with the plan of the notices of books in this journal to give lengthy quotations, it would be easy to illustrate what we think, to prove the assertion. As it is, we will just point to the introduction to the subject-matter of the paper entitled "A Plated Article," and ask whether in his happiest vein Mr. Dickens ever produced anything more amusing or more suggestive of the situation which the writer describes? It is not often that fugitive contributions to periodicals are entitled to be put into a more enduring shape; and we think that reprints from magazines and reviews are more frequent than is at all commensurate with the general merits of such productions; but we are of opinion that an exception may fairly be made in favour of this book of Mr. Wills, and the only objection we have to make to its publication is that it has been delayed, for the date of the latest paper is January, 1857, while the first goes as far back as March, 1850. As most of the essays are founded on some subject of the day, they have to contend with so much disadvantage as is attached to that circumstance.

THE PARLIAMENTARY COMPANION. By ROBERT P. DOD. Notwithstanding the appearance of more than one rival in the field, Mr. Dod's "Parliamentary Companion" continues to hold the position it has occupied from the first moment of its publication, and the work has now reached its twenty-eighth year. Of its general character it is now superfluous to say anything, and we would only point out the circumstances which give the present issue its specialty:—The impending discussion of a new Reform Bill, and of the financial changes connected with the defences of the country, will make the volume for this year indispensable to all readers of newspapers. The following are the chief features of the edition for 1860:—A complete change of Ministry has taken place, causing a variety of alterations in every part of the volume. In that part of the book entitled "Constituency" the population and registered electors of every county and borough are derived from the latest returns, and the polls from the official declarations communicated by the various returning officers. The close balance of parties has rendered increased vigilance necessary in recording the politics of each member. In all possible cases the exact words of the member himself have been preferred to any other statement of his political principles, and the entire work has been revised from the first article to the last.

THE PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, AND KNIGHTAGE OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND FOR 1860. By ROBERT P. DOD.

The annual edition of Mr. Dod's useful and handy guide to the titular class in the country has been published. Every one knows that the peculiarity of this volume consists in its low price, its unlarged contents, and its facility of reference, secured by a careful arrangement of the subject-matter which has been adopted. The following are a few of the alterations in the new edition for the present year:—The past year has been marked by the creation of several new peerages, the unexpected succession of collaterals to noble houses to old titles previously merged in higher dignities, the gift of baronetcies for political and public services, the creation of many new Privy Councillors, the creation of several fresh colonial bishoprics, and the nomination both at home and abroad of many new Judges who have been knighted; and all these collectively have filled the volume for 1860 with as large an amount of novelty as on any occasion for the last twenty years during which the work has been published. The eminent services of the British forces against the sepoy mutineers have been necessarily marked by a large addition to the Order of the Bath, many creations of other titles, and very extensive promotions in the Army and Navy. The casualties and deaths by disease in the course of the same conflicts, together with the frequent successions to titles, have led to an amount of minute changes throughout the whole volume that can scarcely be estimated or described. The accession of a new Ministry to power in June last has caused an important series of official exchanges which have altered some hundreds of accounts. A large number of titled persons have been gazetted as officers of the volunteer rifle corps, and these appointments are recorded under each name. The unceasing influence of births, deaths, and marriages occurring among seven or eight thousand individuals has produced its usual effect on the edition for 1860. With regard to the additions made by lapse of time and new creations no less than eighty-eight names might be enumerated as comprehending some of the more important novelties. The very latest facts have been recorded up to the date of publication.

THE HON. A. T. GALT, FINANCE MINISTER OF CANADA.

No reader of modern fiction can be ignorant of the name of John Galt, the author of "The Ayrshire Legatees," "Annals of the Parish," "Lawrie Todd," and a score of other novels equally good, and in their day as popular as any that now enjoy the favour of the public. The Scottish stories which literature owes to John Galt have long been regarded as containing more perfect pictures of humble Scottish life than any other author has given us, and to their accuracy Sir Walter Scott himself bore willing and cordial testimony. Galt was the contemporary as well as friend of Scott, Byron, Lockhart, Professor Wilson, and all the other literary celebrities of the day, who found in him a genial companion and a warmly-attached friend. Mr. Galt, besides being a prolific author, was also an excellent man of business. It was mainly through the activity that Galt, the Canada Company was organised, and in its service in connection with that magnificent country, John Galt was accompanied to Canada by his family, and his three sons have all made Canada their home.

Alexander Tilloch Galt, the gentleman who this week presents to our readers, was born at Chelsea on the 6th of September, 1817. He derives his second name from his maternal grandfather, Dr. Tilloch, who was well known as a distinguished man of science at the beginning of the present century. Young Galt early showed that he inherited some of his father Literary talent, for at the age only fourteen years of age he wrote in Fraser's Magazine. But literature was not destined to be the pursuit of his life. At the age of sixteen he entered the service of the British American Land Company, of which, as the Canada Land Company, his father had been a zealous promoter. Commencing as a junior clerk, Mr. Galt filled in succession all the offices in that company's service until he finally became a commissioner and manager in 1844.

During these twenty-two years the company underwent various vicissitudes, and it was not when its affairs were in a state to that the London directors conferred upon Mr. A. T. Galt the full management of their estates in Canada. That the selection was a judicious one is evident by the fact that between 1844 and 1849 the investment in 1844 and that of his retirement the position of the company was changed from one of hopeless insolvency to that of a valuable and remunerating undertaking.

Mr. Galt may justly be proud of being one of the first persons who advocated the development of the resources of Canada by the introduction of the railway system. He was the most prominent promoter of the Atlantic and St. Lawrence Railway, which now forms part of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, and by which the trade of the province has been carried to the sea-board in the winter season. He was an original director of the company, and at a period of great financial embarrassment became its president. With the co-operation of the Hon. John Young, of Montreal, the works were successfully carried out; and Mr. Galt's connection with the company ceased only on his acceptance of office with the Grand Trunk Railway.

The first introduction of Mr. Galt into Canadian politics occurred in 1849, when he was unanimously returned as member for the important county of Sherbrooke, which was then the largest English constituency in Lower Canada. At this period the province was convulsed by the agitation arising from the proposed payment of the rebellion losses, a rebellion which may be remembered as having caused the destruction of the Houses of Parliament at Montreal by an excited mob. Though always entertaining Liberal opinions, Mr. Galt was strongly opposed to the policy of the Government on that question. The excitement attendant upon the destruction of the Parliament buildings resulted in a proposal to hold the sittings of the Legislature alternately in Toronto and Quebec. Mr. Galt strongly opposed the change; and in consequence of his opinions on this subject he was induced to retire from Parliament. He was also partly led to take this step from his attendance at the House in Toronto being, in some respects, incompatible with the discharge of other duties, which required his personal attention in Lower Canada.

When the sittings of Parliament were resumed in Lower Canada he again entered the House as member for the borough of Sherbrooke, for which town he has since been four times unanimously re-elected. On his return to political life he acted with the more advanced Liberals in the House, the Government having been formed by a coalition of the Conservatives with one section of the Liberal party, the opposition being rather to the constitution of the Government than to its measures, which were based upon the policy advocated by the Liberal party for many years. Mr. Galt continued to act with the Opposition until the general election of 1857, when, feeling that the views then held by the Upper Canada section of the party were producing a dangerous and hurtful spirit of sectionalism, he stated to his constituents that he could no longer co-operate with those whose course was, in his opinion, detrimental to the peace and prosperity of the province. In August, 1858, the M'Donald-Cartier Government resigned, when Mr. Brown, the leader of the Opposition, was sent for, but only held office for three days, not being able to command a majority in either House of Parliament. The Governor-General then sent for Mr. Galt, as occupying an intermediate position and independent of both parties. The hon. gentleman declined the trust, alleging as his reason that he conceived the Government of the country should be in the hands of those who possessed the confidence of the strongest party in the House, and that, therefore, his Excellency should be advised to recall his former Ministers, whose defeat, he thought, had arisen on a question not requiring their resignation.

During Mr. Galt's connection with the Canadian Parliament he has always devoted a large share of his attention to financial and commercial subjects, and is looked up to as the highest authority in the House upon these important questions. His opinions were and are in unison with those of the Free-traders of this country—that is, that customs duties should be levied for the sole purposes of revenue, and that every obstacle should be removed from the free interchange of the products of labour. When the M'Donald-Cartier Administration returned to office, Mr. Cartier sought the assistance of Mr. Galt, and offered him the office of Inspector-General or Minister of Finance, which Mr. Galt accepted, and which he now holds. On his joining the Administration the financial and general policy of the Government was announced as embracing a federation of the Canadian provinces and the restoration of a sound system of finance—the two subjects with which Mr. Galt was more particularly identified. One of the more important changes which the hon. gentleman proposed was the consolidation of the public debt of Canada and the redemption of the various indirect liabilities of the province, which, it is well known, have always had a depressing influence upon its credit. The success which has attended this policy has been recently fully established by the reception which has attended the new Canadian loan. It has obtained the approval of the highest financial authorities, and of the public in general in this country, and bears complete evidence of Mr. Galt's fitness for the influential position he now fills in the greatest colony of the British Crown.

CALISTHENIC EXERCISES IN INDIA.

CALISTHENIC EXERCISES IN INDIA.

IT has been suggested by a well-known and able writer that the defence of the shores of old England must ever be looked for chiefly in the brave hearts and stalwart arms of her sons, and that, in order to promote the latter quality in young Englishmen, athletic sports should be extensively encouraged. At such a time the accompanying Illustration may be acceptable to our readers, as it represents one of the most effectual athletic exercises known anywhere in common use throughout India. The clubs in use are of wood, varying in weight according to the power of the person using them, and in length about two feet and a half, and some six or seven inches in diameter at the base, which is leveled so as to admit of their standing firmly when placed in the ground, and thus affording great convenience for raising them to the swinging position. The exercise is in great repute amongst the native soldiery, police, and others whose castes render them liable to emergencies where great strength of muscle is desirable. The evolutions which the clubs are made to perform in the hands of one accustomed to their use are exceedingly graceful. The motions which appear most in favour are those represented in the Sketch, but they may be varied almost without limit. Besides the great recommendation of simplicity, the Indian club practice possesses the essential property of expanding the chest, and exercising every muscle in the body concurrently; and we believe it will be found well worthy of attention from all who are interested in giving to the young men of Great Britain strong arms to second the purposes of brave hearts.

CINGALESE BOAT.

THE boat shown in the accompanying Engraving is a familiar object on the coast, or the luxuriant shores of the island of Ceylon; and it never fails to call forth the admiration of the stranger for its graceful motion in the water, as well as for the skill with which the swarthy boatmen manage the huge sail, so utterly at variance with European notions of the proportion which a to the voyager along the Malabar sail ought to bear to a boat's hull. As soon, however, as it comes more within view the means are apparent by which the light boat is made to sustain such heavy rigging. A canoe-shaped float of solid wood is projected and sustained from the boat's side by outriggers, which are secured by lashings to the mast and gunwales, as seen in the Illustration. Whichever way the wind sets the float has the effect of counterbalancing the side pressure on the sail. If, for instance, the wind is on the starboard quarter (supposing the float to be on the opposite side), the effect is a pressure on the float, which is immediately resisted by its buoyancy; but if the wind is from the larboard side the float acts with the same effect, but this time by its weight. The relative power of the sail filled, and the capacity of the float to resist the capsizing tendency, is nicely calculated, for in a fresh breeze the float is not uncommonly seen suspended in the air. It will be observed by the reader that, although the natural side motion of the boat is thus influenced by the peculiar appendage described, the power for propulsion is scarcely interfered with. It is this fact which enables the Ceylon boat to attain unusual speed, and to face a breeze which an ordinary sailing-boat dare not encounter. The outrigger is fitted with temporary fastenings only, so as to admit of its being shifted from side to side to suit different conditions of wind and tide.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1860.

PARLIAMENT has had the Navy Estimates expounded to it by Lord Clarence Paget, and the country is glad to hear that we shall soon have a fleet of sixty ships of the line. At present the French Navy is stronger than our own—ten words which must be an answer to all complaint about expense, though it is certain that we have to learn lessons of economy, as was feelingly urged by Mr. Gladstone in his Budget speech. Mr. Spooner, in order to clear the way for a happy fraternisation between his friends and the Ultramontanists, has brought on his usual Maynooth motion, raved his fill, been echoed by Mr. Newdegate, and had the proposition promptly disposed of. A measure has been introduced for getting rid of the grand-jury hindrance to justice, as regards the metropolis, and it will probably lead to the abolition of the institution throughout England as soon as cant has done its work and begun to be laughed at. Another Italian debate has been held in the Lords, and Lord Malmesbury has proved his extreme fitness for office at the present crisis by a violent attack on M. Buoncompagni for daring to be a partisan of his own country instead of a truckler to one of his tyrants. Lord Malmesbury and his friends were enraged that the representative of England should have recognised M. Buoncompagni when he became the delegate of King Victor. This fact should be noted by those, if any, who think foreign affairs might possibly go rightly in the hands of Lord Malmesbury. He would have insulted Sardinia and the Italian people

Convocation is not regarded with much attention, except by those who have a professional interest in it; but the mothers of England will learn with astonishment that a proposal is before the clerical parliament for doing away with godfathers and godmothers. The system is found to be very inconvenient, and to lead to the neglect of baptism. People do not like to bore their friends to "stand," especially as such standing involves an expensive present; and in districts where the clergy are strict, and will not take the parents as sponsors, numbers of children remain unbaptised. Since registration has been compulsory, and the register answers all legal purposes, an additional carelessness about the rite has sprung up. Surely it would be well to meet this fact. Such of the clergy as hold the doctrine that baptism is absolutely necessary to eternal happiness should, as matter of conscience, exert themselves to remove all impediments in its way. And what is the use of stickling for an antiquated form? The sponsorship of the present day is, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, unhappily, a simple farce. A godfather is held to have done his duty when he has given the coral; and, if in his godchild's school days an occasional "tip" is added, the promiser and vower is held to be a model. Is this relation of parties worth preserving?

Another Ministerial change has taken place. The venerable Judge Perrin has retired from the Irish Bench, and his place has been filled by Mr. Fitzgerald, the Irish Attorney-General. Mr. Deasy, the Irish Solicitor-General, of course moves up, but his successor is not yet announced. Both Mr. Cowper and Mr. Hutt have been re-elected without opposition.

The death of Sir William Napier, the historian, is a national loss. How soon he has followed our other great historian! There is not any other domestic incident of importance to chronicle; but there was interest in hearing that Lord Brougham, who had never entered the House of Commons since he left it for the woolsack, was charmed thither by the eloquence of Mr. Gladstone. The cowardly ruffians who, under the pretext of conscience, disturbed the services at St. George's-in-the-East have shown how deeply their consciences were touched. Under the glance of a few policemen all the outrages withered down into a little furtive irreverence of the most sneaking description, and it is almost to be feared that nobody will even get into custody. Our tryingly variable climate has been at its vagaries again, and the thermometer has varied fifteen degrees in twenty-four hours, to the rejoicings of her Majesty's medical subjects, but to the discomfiture of all the rest of the population.

THE COURT.

The Queen and Prince Consort, accompanied by Princess Alice, Prince Arthur, Prince Leopold, and Princesses Helena, Louisa, and Beatrice, left Windsor Castle at half-past three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, attended by the Lords and Ladies of the Royal household, and proceeded to the station of the Great Western Railway on their way to London. The route from the castle to the station was lined by the Windsor Rifle Volunteers. A special train conveyed her Majesty to the Paddington terminus, and the Royal party were escorted thence by a company of light dragoons to Buckingham Palace, where the Queen arrived at half-past four o'clock. In the evening the Queen and Prince Consort honoured the Haymarket Theatre with their presence.

On Sunday the Queen and Prince Consort, Princess Alice, Princesses Helena and Louisa, Prince Arthur, the ladies and gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace. The Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor officiated. The Prince Consort called on the Prince of Orange at Fenton's Hotel, and the Prince of Orange visited her Majesty at Buckingham Palace in the afternoon.

On Monday the Duchess of Cambridge and Princess Mary visited the Queen at Buckingham Palace. Her Majesty's dinner party in the evening included Princess Alice, the Portuguese Minister, Viscount and Viscountess Sydney, Lord George Lennox, the Hon. Mrs. Biddulph, Lieutenant-General Sir George Wetherall, and the Dean of Windsor.

On Tuesday the Princess of Leiningen arrived at Buckingham Palace from Frogmore on a visit to the Queen. Princess Alice and the Princess of Leiningen visited Westminster Abbey and the New Palace of Westminster in the afternoon; and in the evening honoured the Olympic Theatre with their presence.

On Wednesday the Queen held her first Levee this season at St. James's Palace. In the evening her Majesty visited the Adelphi Theatre.

The Countess of Desart has succeeded Lady Churchill as the Lady in Waiting to her Majesty.

THE LEVEE.

The Queen held her first Levee this season on Wednesday, at St. James's Palace. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort arrived from Buckingham Palace at one o'clock, and were received by the great officers of State. The Queen and the Prince entered the throne-room, attended by the Duchess of Sutherland, Mistress of the Robes, the Countess of Desart, Lady in Waiting; the Earl of St. Germans, Lord Steward; Viscount Sydney, Lord Chamberlain; the Marquis of Ailesbury, Master of the Horse; and the other Lords and Ladies of the Royal household.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar were present.

We are informed, says the Times of Thursday, that Lord Elgin will undertake a second mission as Plenipotentiary to China, in the hope of being able, by the influence obtained in his former visit, to secure the ratification of the Treaty of Tien-Tsin, and obtain an entire cessation of hostilities.

THE COUNTRY AND THE BUDGET.

Opinions favourable to the Budget have been pronounced in all parts of the country. All the objections to the scheme point to minor details. Thus the shipowners condemn the treaty because it fails to place the shipping of both countries on the same footing; the licensed victuallers are organising a movement for opposing the proposed licensing of eating-houses; and a petition is being got up for the rejection of the three clauses of the budget providing for an import and export charge of one penny on goods in packages and in bulk, for charges to be levied on the removal of warehoused goods under bond, and for charges on such warehouse operations as repacking, reweighing, &c. Objections are made to other parts of the scheme; but, as a whole, it seems to have been cordially accepted. At a meeting of the Lancashire Reformers' Union held at Manchester, on Monday, Mr. Bright expressed approval of the Budget as a Free-trade Budget; and Mr. Bazley was confident that the Budget and the Treaty would be ratified with triumph. The Manchester Chamber of Commerce have agreed to a petition praying the House of Commons to pass the Budget—which it describes as a sound fiscal, industrial, and commercial measure—with all convenient speed; and other Chambers of Commerce have passed resolutions in its favour. A meeting of Conservatives was held at Lord Salisbury's town residence on Tuesday The Daily News states that Lord Derby told his supporters that he did not desire to expel Lord Palmerston from office just now, but that he advised them, in order to show their strength, to make a grand demonstration against the Ministerial financial scheme. The Morning Post gives currency to a rumour that, on Monday, Mr. Disraeli will move an amendment on the Budget, condemning the repeal of taxes that are not insupportable by industry, in order to impose taxation on property and income. He will, it is said, denounce the 10d. income tax, the repeal of the paper duty, the extension of licenses to eating-houses, and the provision of the commercial treaty relative to the export of coal.

Fancy Dress Ball in Liverpool.—A fancy dress ball, in aid of the principal local charities and the National Life-boat Institution, took place in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, on Tuesday evening. The ball was attended by about 1500 of the élite of the town and district. The dresses were very rich and varied, and the show of uniforms, naval, military, and volunteer, unusually large. For the supper-room, Mr. Morrish, the purveyor, covered in the Colonnade fronting Lime-street, which formed a magnificent apartment, 200 feet long. The band of forty picked instrumentalists was conducted by Mr. Streather.

Elections.—On Monday the Right Hon. W. T. Cowper, the new Chief Commissioner of Public Works, was re-elected for Hertford without opposition. In returning thanks he advocated the principles of free trade, and gave his opinion that the Budget of Mr. Gladstone would improve our manufactures and extend our commerce.——The election for Gateshead, consequent upon Mr. William Hutt accepting the office of Vice-President of the Board of Trade, took place also on Monday. Not only was he re-elected without opposition, but his personal presence was dispensed with. The proceedings occupied little more than ten minutes.

Snowballing Riot on the Liverpool Exchange Flags.—Last Saturday morning there was a heavy fall of snow at Liverpool. Snow from five to six inches deep lay on the Exchange flags. The Stock Exchange gentlemen were eager for enjoyment, and a general mêlée took place. Snowballs were thrown here and there, and such was the tumult that twenty or thirty of the police force were called out. This seemed to add fuel to the fire, and the fun became fast and furious. Policemen's and civilians' hats were crushed and served in a most shabby manner, and the head constable had at last to order the water-plugs to be discharged on the delinquents. Six persons were arrested, but on their giving their names and addresses they were discharged.

The Stephenson Memorial Institute at Willington, near Newcastle, was opened, amid great rejoicings, yesterday week. The village was gaily decorated with flags, which formed an arcade through the principal street, and on every side tokens were not wanting that the occasion was one of jubilee to the neighbourhood. Shortly after two o'clock a large crowd assembled in front of the institute; whilst those who had donned their holiday attire were admitted into the school. At the time appointed for the commencement of the ceremony the school-room was completely filled with a number of ladies and gentlemen, the former of whom were accommodated with seats immediately below the daïs on which the speakers were assembled. The room was profusely adorned with flags, and the proceedings were enlivened by the band of the Tynemouth Artillery Volunteers playing a variety of pleasing airs. Lord Ravensworth presided, and appropriate speeches were delivered by various local speakers.

A Murder is reported from Skegness, a pleasant little watering-place on the Lincolnshire coast, a few miles north of Boston. Three farm labourers, named Lynn, Moody, and Howard, were turned out of an inn, at midnight, after drinking; Lynn and Moody went one way, Howard another. The following afternoon a number of boys playing by the roadside discovered the body of Lynn in a ditch, within about 150 yards of the spot where the three men had separated the night previously. There were marks of a struggle on the road, and by the ditch-side two caps were found, one of which belonged to the deceased and the other to Moody, who was, in consequence, immediately apprehended. He had for some time been at variance with the deceased; sundry cuts appeared on his face; the trousers he had worn on Saturday night were found to be quite wet; his boots corresponded with marks on the road; and the widow of the deceased says that, while sitting up for her husband, she saw Moody pass her house without his cap.

The Wakefield Commission.—The Commissioners appointed to inquire into the malpractices at the last election at Wakefield have issued their report. They find that both candidates, Mr. Leatham and Mr. Charlesworth, were more or less implicated in the corrupt and illegal practices carried on at the last election. Mr. Leatham expended, through his agents, "at least" £3900; of this sum only £473 had passed through the auditor's hand, and "at least" from £1800 to £1900 was expended in bribery. Mr. Charlesworth's minimum expenditure was £4150; the sum passed by the auditor was £652 10s.; and of the residue, "disbursed in illegal payments," £1600 "at least" was employed in bribing electors. The Commissioners declare that Mr. Leatham "provided the said moneys with the intention that they should be employed, in part at least, in bribery and corruption." The judgment on Mr. Charlesworth is less pointed, but there is no mistaking its full purport:—"He provided the fund out of which the bribery was afterwards carried on on his behalf, and designedly abstained up to the election from inquiring as to the manner in which that fund was being employed, having before the election the means of knowing and good grounds to suspect the manner of its disposal." It is stated that 142 electors were engaged during the contest in corrupt practices, and from this fact, coupled with the number of persons "who voluntarily joined in the work of giving and offering bribes," and the zeal and skill displayed in the whole of the operations, the Commissioners arrive at the conclusion that large numbers of the electors were not then engaged "for the first time" in deeds of "gross corruption."

Birmingham Rifle Corps.—Yesterday se'nnight the volunteers, comprising the company raised by Mr. Charles Ratcliff, brother of Sir John Ratcliff, late Mayor, met that gentleman at the Townhall. Mr. Charles Ratcliff, who was very warmly received, expressed the high gratification it gave him to meet the volunteers now present; and placed in plain, practical language before them the fact that they should well consider the importance and responsibility of the step they were about to take; listen attentively to the rules for the observance of the corps; and if any one present felt doubtful of his capacity to obey them that he should at once retire, and not commit himself by the oath of allegiance, or join the movement for pastime or display, instead of legitimate purpose—namely, self-imposed duty. Ninety-six volunteers were then sworn in. This is the first example in England of a gentleman raising a company and clothing them at his own expense. Sir John Ratcliff also has clothed twenty men at his own cost.

Volunteer Officers and the Levee.—Tuesday night's Gazette, in announcing the Court to be held on the 7th of March next "for the special and exclusive reception of officers of volunteer corps," says the officers who are desirous of attending should forthwith communicate their intention to the respective Lords Lieutenant. The officers will enter the Palace at the usual corridor entrance, opposite Marlborough House, and will be shown at once to the room appointed for the assembling of their corps, where they will form into companies in the order in which they are to pass the Queen. In order to facilitate this arrangement each officer will be furnished with a card, on which is distinctly written his county, the number of his county in the "Army List," and the name and number of his corps, company, or subdivision. "Artillery" should be specially marked on the cards of officers of artillery volunteer corps. The doors of the Palace will be opened at half-past twelve, and no officer can be admitted after a quarter before two o'clock.——A rifle volunteer ball is to take place on the evening of the 7th of March in the new Floral Hall adjoining the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, and will be under the immediate patronage of her Majesty. There is talk of a public dinner also on the same day.

Volunteer Rifle Corps and their Officers.—A correspondence of great importance to volunteer rifle corps has just taken place between Lord Elcho and Earl De Grey and Ripon. When the rules of the London Scottish Corps were drawn up a clause was inserted reserving to the rank and file the right to veto any gentlemen recommended by the commanding officer for commissions. On the rules being submitted to the Lord Lieutenant, however, his Lordship at once put his pen through the veto clause, submitting that it infringed the prerogative of the Crown, and was opposed to the constitutional powers of Lords Lieutenant. Lord De Grey and Ripon was appealed to on the subject, but he confirmed the Marquis of Salisbury's decision. This caused great discontent among the members of the corps, and their Colonel, Lord Elcho, anxious to have the question finally settled, asked the Under Secretary of War whether he "would approve of commanding officers before making recommendations, for which they would be responsible, taking what steps may appear to them most expedient, with a view to finding out who are the persons who would as officers be most acceptable to their corps." The official reply was to the effect that, although the appointment of all officers is vested in the Lord Lieutenant, subject to her Majesty's approval, still Mr. Sidney Herbert had no objection to make the concession involved in Lord Elcho's question.

The Army Estimates.—The comprehensive statistics relating to the anticipated cost and strength of our Army during the ensuing year have at length been issued, by which we learn that the total number of men serving her Majesty in the Army during the year on which we have just entered will be 235,852. This number includes men of all ranks, and 92,490 who, being on the East Indian establishment, must be deducted from the total number in order to ascertain the number which Parliament will be asked to vote, which is thus reduced to 143,362. Of this smaller force 13,390 men are required for the cavalry, including the horse artillery, and 128,851 for the infantry, including the foot artillery, or 142,241 for the total regimental establishments, showing an augmentation of strength to the amount of 6389 men, the great majority of whom are added to the foot artillery and the infantry of the line, the former arm of the service being raised to a strength of 20,952, the latter to that of 84,709 men. The cavalry of the line is left unaltered in strength from last year, 10,329 men being on its rolls. The same is the case with the Life Guards and Horse Guards, consisting of 1338 men, and with the Horse Artillery, consisting of 1723. The staff is composed of 1121 men, 159 (excluding officers on regimental full pay) being on the general staff. The commissariat staff consists of 198 men, the medical staff of 386. These numbers differ slightly from those corresponding to them in the estimate for last year, but to an unimportant extent. The number of horses required for the service of these troops is 14,632, or more by the odd hundreds than were required last year. The Army Estimates show, as Mr. Gladstone had intimated, an increase upon the last year of nearly £2,000,000.

The French Gallery.—We paid a visit to this gallery on Thursday, where the Strawberry-hill collection of portraits is on view for a brief period. This collection—formed by the taste and liberality of Countess Waldegrave—consists of portraits of many of the notabilities of the day, of both sexes, whether distinguished for high rank, for intellectual endowments, or personal beauty. They have been painted (with one exception) by Sant, in his best and most attractive manner, and display an intelligent variety in style, according to the character of the original. Thus the portrait of the amiable Countess herself, in evening dress, is painted with the utmost luxe of colour and treatment; and the Duchess of Sutherland, the Marchioness of Stafford, and Lady Constance Grosvenor, are each charming representations of the choicest feminine beauty of the day; whilst Lord Lyndhurst, the Earl of Clarendon, and the Bishop of Oxford are dealt with after a severer fashion, but with commendable truthfulness and remarkable effect. The portraits of the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale are admirable for the grandeur of style thrown into them. The only portrait not by Sant is that of Lady Churchill, by Grant, and evinces good taste and high artistic skill. These portraits are about to be engraved by Mr. Holl and others for publication by Mr. Gambart.

"SANCHO PANZA."—BY J. GILBERT.—IN THE EXHIBITION OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

Mr. Gilbert, in his selection of poetic subjects, divides his attentions between Shakespeare and Cervantes; and he has done well to couple them; for, of all the poets of modern times—for there be prose-poets as well as verse-poets—none was better worthy to sit by the side of our great dramatist than the author of "Don Quixote." The scene which the artist has chosen is that wherein the rustic squire of the bewildered knight-errant is eating his frugal meal after a hard day's adventure, and ruminating upon the fortunes of himself and his master. At last he sums up his resolves in these few piquant words:—"Well, this matter of mine, by a thousand tokens that I have seen, is mad enough to be tied in his bed; and, in truth, I come very little behind him. Nay, I am madder than he, since I follow and serve him." The huge figure and brawny hands of the serving-man are a perfect presentment of mere animal development; the face, surmounted with short stubbly hair, is a study upon which Mr. Gilbert may well pride himself—so comically ugly, so inconceivably loutish, and yet with a certain twinkle in the little half-closed eyes which denotes cunning, if not intelligence. The landscape background is wild and picturesque, and painted in that warm tone of shade which the artist so generally adopts, following the Dutch school of Rembrandt and his period.

TANGIER.

The appetite of the Spanish forces in Morocco for conquest seems to have been sharpened rather than satiated by the conquest of Tetuan; for we now learn by telegram that no proposals of peace from Morocco will be listened to on the part of Spain until Tangier shall have been swallied or given up, and that operations are to be immediately commenced against that town. Marshal O'Donnell, too, declares that he will not discontinue offensive operations until the enemy shall have asked mercy, and until "an indemnity shall have been obtained for the sacrifices of Spain."

On the opposite page we engrave a "View of Tangier from the Casual Market." The view is taken from the great open "soc," or bazaar, outside the Tetuan gate. The walled portion of the town on the height contains the Alcazar and the Governor's residence. The Strait of Gibraltar and the Spanish coast are seen over the lower town, terminating in the Rock itself, distant about thirty-three miles. On page 136 is an Engraving of "The Port of Tangier," the view being taken from the ruined mole. The tower with the scallops, or coloured tiles, for which the Moors were so famous, belongs to the principal mosque. This is the only landing-place.

Tangier (Tanjah, a place amidst vines, in the Berber language), the town where the European Consuls reside, derives its importance from its position rather than from its commerce or its population. In both these respects it is only of third-rate importance compared with Rabat. It is built on a hill, near a spacious bay, and its harbour is defended by three small fortresses. The streets are wider and straighter than in other towns of the empire; but except the houses of the European Consuls, and a few belonging to rich persons, they are mostly small and inconvenient. The town is surrounded by mouldering walls, with round and square towers every sixty paces, and three stout gates. Crowning all is the Kasbah, an old and extensive castellated palace, the residence of the Governor. The principal mosque, El Jama' Kebir, is large and rather handsome, with a sma, or tower, wrought in coloured tesselated work. The Jews have several synagogues, and the Roman Catholics have a church and convent. The population is estimated at 10,000, of whom 2500 are Jews, 1400 Negroes, 300 Berbers, and about 100 Christians. Of Tangier Mr. Richardson says:—"The Phœnicians, Romans, Goths, and Arabs successively affected its conquest; and it was long a bone of eager contention between the Moors and Portuguese. In 1471 Alonzo, King of Portugal, took it from the Moors; and in 1662 it came into the hands of the English, as a part of the dowry of Catherine, Queen of Charles II.; so, whilst in our possession, it was a place of considerable strength; but, on its evacuation in 1684, by order of the English Government, who were disgusted by the expense of its occupation, and the hostile collisions with the natives, the fortifications were demolished, and only the vestiges of them now are visible. Had the British Government continued its occupation for half a century, and kept in check the Marauine tribes, it is probable that by this time the greater part of Morocco would have been under British rule, when we might have founded a flourishing colony, from which all North Africa might have received the elements of Christian civilisation." A small river pours its waters into the bay on its southern side; it was once navigable, but is now choked up with sandbanks. The remains of a Roman bridge are extant on this river, and near it are said to be the ruins of ancient Tingis—like Tangier, a corruption of the Berber Tanjah. A vast quantity of European merchandise is imported here from Gibraltar for Fez and the north of Morocco. All the postal and despatch business also comes through Tangier, which has privileges that few or no other Marquine cities possess. The Emperors, indeed, have been wont to call it "the City of Christians." In the environs there is at times a good deal of game, and the European residents go out to shoot, as one is wont in other countries to take a walk. The principal game is the partridge and hare, and the grand port the wild boar.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

An abstract of the Financial Statement was given in the town edition of this Journal last week.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10

THE BUDGET.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, at a few moments before five o'clock, rose, and was received with cordial cheering from all parts of the House. He commenced by alluding to the fact that in the present year a sum of two millions and a half of the interest of the National Debt was about to lapse; the war duty on tea and sugar and the income tax also were about to cease. These circumstances, coupled with the commercial treaty with France, had compelled the Government to adopt the unusual course of causing the financial statement to procede the Estimates of the year. The receipts of the year were as follows:—Customs, £24,750,000; excise, £19,724,000; stamps, £8,000,000; land and assessed taxes, £3,200,000; income tax, £9,894,000; post-office, £3,250,000; crown lands, £230,000; miscellaneous, £1,408,000. The expenditure had been:—Interest on debt, £28,638,000; army, £13,550,000; navy, £12,630,000; civil service, £7,700,000; revenue departments, £4,475,000, which, with the miscellaneous charges, reached a sum of £68,953,000, which would, under ordinary circumstances, have left a surplus of £1,625,000. But there had been additional charges, arising out of the expedition to China, in the army of £900,000, and the navy £270,000. Then came the effect of the treaty with France, for which there was to be deducted from the customs £640,000. The total was £1,800,000, which would have placed the revenue on the wrong side of the account; but in a happy moment Spain had paid a debt of £500,000, of which £250,000 would be available at once, and so that a small surplus would still be left on the total revenue. The estimated charge for the interest of the debt in the coming year was £26,200,000, leaving £2,438,000, or more than the annuities which were about to lapse. The Consolidated Fund charges would be £2,000,000. The army, militia, and the charge for China would be £15,800,000, the navy and packet service £13,900,000, or together £29,700,000, by an increase of more than three millions. The miscellaneous estimates were £3,500,000; the revenue departments, £4,700,000; the total being £70,100,000. With respect to the increase of the military expenditure, he would leave it to the Ministers for the two departments to explain the circumstances. The estimate of the income for the year in perspective, taking the imports as they now stood, was:—Customs, £22,700,000; excise, £19,170,000; stamps, £8,000,000; taxes, £3,250,000; income tax, £3,200,000; with the post office the total being £60,700,000; being a deficit of £9,400,000; and this without any provision for £1,000,000 coming due on Exchequer Bonds. Supposing that the existing war duties on tea and sugar were retained, the deficit would still be £7,300,000. That would require an income tax of 9d. in the pound, there being no remission of taxation in the trade and commerce of the country; but the £9,400,000 would require an income tax of 1s. in the pound. It might be asked, what had become of the calculations of 1853? His answer was, that in that year it was reckoned there would be gained by taxes then imposed between that and the present time a sum of £5,959,000, which was about the sum which the income tax would have reached at 5d. in the pound in this year. The succession duty had failed to produce what was expected. All surpluses in different years, by the intervention of war, had been stopped, and besides there was the charge for a `ditional debt incurred by the Russian war, which amounted to £2,920,000. The alteration in the spirit duties, however, had added £2,000,000 to the revenue; and the revenue generally had been so increased that, if the expenditure had not rapidly increased, the amount calculated in 1853 would have been realised. The answer was, in short, increased expenditure.

The right honourable gentleman then compared the wealth of the country in 1842 and in 1853 with that in 1857-58 and 1859-60. In 1842 the annual income of the country was £154,000,000; in 1853, £172,000,000; in 1857-8, £191,000,000; and in 1859-60, £200,000,000, the increase having occurred in every class in the country, and in the agricultural class the most of all. In 1842 the gross expenditure of the country was £68,500,000; in 1853 it was £71,560,000; in 1859-60 it was £87,697,000: these totals, including the local expenditure as well as that of the State properly so called, showing a gradual and large increase. The comparative growth of wealth and expenditure was, therefore, wholly unequal, and it showed the course which the country was pursuing—a course with which he was far from satisfied. There was a deficit of £9,400,000 to be met. No radical change could be made in the expenditure of the year. It was, he urged, the duty of the Government to take further steps in the direction of relieving trade and commerce from imposts in pursuance of the principles of free trade, notwithstanding the unequal state of revenue and expenditure which existed. The right hon. gentleman then entered into calculations to show that remission of taxation had been accompanied by increase of revenue, consequent on the increase of trade and commerce. He did not propose to touch the taxes on tea or sugar, and they would be renewed as they now stood for one year.

As to the treaty with France, that country was to reduce the duties on coal and iron in 1860; on yarn, flax, and hemp, early in 1861. On the 1st of October, 1861, the duties would be reduced or prohibition removed from all British articles, so that no duty should be higher than 30 per cent ad valorem, all the staple manufactures of Britain being included. In three years afterwards the maximum duty was to be 25 per cent ad valorem. On her part England was engaged immediately and totally to abolish all duty on all manufactured goods from France, to reduce the duty on brandy to 8s. 2d. a gallon, on foreign wine (not merely French) to 3s. per gallon, and in 1861 still further, in reference to the strength of the wine—the lowest duty being 1s. per gallon. The charge on French articles chargeable with excise duty in England to be the same as the English duty. The treaty was to be in force for ten years. He denied that this treaty indicated any subserviency to France, and in glowing language called on the two countries to inaugurate a new epoch of amity, as distinguished from former jealousy and ill feeling—a union of the two nations, not merely of the two Governments. The reduction of duty on wine would cause a loss in revenue of £515,000; on brandy, of £225,000; on manufactured goods, of £440,000; making a total of £1,190,000. As to the objection that these were revenue duties, and did not relieve the poor man, not one of them was a revenue duty, but they were all protective duties. The right hon. gentleman quoted statistics to illustrate an argument to the effect that it was desirable to make such a bargain with France as would allow of the interchange of manufactures and commodities, which was already important, and which must largely increase when France was induced to break down her prohibitory system. What had been done would have been good for this country if France had done nothing; it was better for us in proportion as France did something. (This reasoning was received with great approbation from gentlemen behind the right hon. gentleman.) One result of the high duty on French brandy was the manufacture of an unhappy production in the shape of a spirit called British brandy. As to wine, it was said to be the rich man's luxury, and tea the poor man's luxury; but in 1760 tea was the rich man's luxury, and sold at 20s. a pound; and by reducing the duty you might make wine the poor man's luxury. In fact, the existing duties were not merely protective but prohibitory, and there was a pressure with regard to that article which, apart from any treaty with France, would compel a dealing with the wine duties. The consumption of foreign wines in this country had greatly increased, by at least 168,000 gallons in the last year, and concurrent with that there had been a large consumption of colonial wines and even of British wines. This showed a great demand for wine, and there was reason to believe that a greater production of wines fitted for the English market and the middle and lower classes of this country could be effected. The idea that under no possible circumstances could Englishmen like French wines ought to be exploded, there being, in fact, a great taste in England for those wines, but which was stifled by prohibitory duties, which generated a mass of evils in the shape of fraud and adulteration. The alteration in the tariff with France would tend greatly to facilitate personal intercourse with the Continent. The right hon. gentleman eulogised the Emperor of the French for bringing about a great measure of free trade, and paid a still more glowing and earnest compliment to Mr. Cobden. (This was received with cheers from both sides of the House.)

It was proposed to reduce other customs duties to the extent of £910,100, but to supply that sum by other impositions on trade. The duties to be abolished were those on butter, tallow, cheese, oranges and lemons, eggs, &c., which amounted to £380,000 a year. There were to be reductions of duties on timber from 7s. 6d. to 1s. and 2s., on currants to 7s. a cwt., raisins to 7s., figs to 7s., and hops from 45s. to 14s., making £658,000—the total reduction being £1,039,000. The revenue to compensate this loss would be sought in an extension of penny taxation, and there would be levied on all packages of imported articles a tax of one penny each, which would produce £300,000 a year. Moderate charges were to be laid on operations in the system of warehousing, a process which would simplify the system of inland bonding. This would produce £120,000. Then there would be a duty of 6s. a cwt on chicory, yielding £90,000. There would be penny stamps and 3d. stamps on certain trade documents; eating-houses, including pastrycooks, would be allowed licenses to sell wine or beer. The duty on game certificates would be altered to a sliding scale according to time, going down to £1. (This item created some sensation among the country gentlemen.) Among other things touched were agreements for leases, and some legal documents, and a stamp would be imposed on extracts from registry of births, deaths, &c. There would be a saving of expense in the customs and inland revenue departments. Altogether £982,000 would be restored to the general revenue. The loss to the revenue would be £2,146,000 by the French treaty and reduction of duties. Of this, half was redeemed by the above imposts.

The right hon. gentleman proceeded to say that he was about to propose the abolition of the excise duty on paper. (This announcement was received with much cheering.) The duty was a bad and untenable one, and had been condemned by the House of Commons. It operated most oppressively on the common sorts of paper, and tended to restrict the circulation of cheap literature. The materials which the duty affected were of boundless scope, as everything fibrous could be converted into paper, which was an article extensively used in sixty-nine trades. The duty on paper had closed all the small mills, and the manufacture of paper was monopolised by two or three makers. By taking off the duty they would promote rural labour, and so produce a beneficial effect on the poor rates of the various districts. A member of that House (Mr. H. Ingram), second, he believed, to no man in England for his enterprise, had strikingly illustrated the effect of the paper manufacture on poor rates. A few years ago, with a view to the supply of paper for a very well-known periodical (the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS), he established a paper-manufactory at Rickmansworth, and within three or four years after its establishment the poor rates were diminished in that parish by one-half. That, he thought, was a very telling and interesting fact. The tax was rapidly becoming untenable, and its abolition would enable the Government to carry out a measure which would effect a saving of £20,000 in the inland revenue establishments. He proposed, therefore, that the paper duty should be abolished from the 1st of July, allowing the usual drawback to those who had stocks on hand. It was proposed to abolish the impressed stamp on newspapers. These were all the remissions it was proposed to make.

As to hops, the system of hop credits would be altered. It was proposed to remove the prohibition on malt, and to fix a duty on it of 3s. a bushel. The alterations and reductions he had proposed would give a total relief to the consumer of £3,931,000, and cause a net loss to the revenue of £2,108,000, or about equivalent to the amount falling in from the cessation of Government annuities this year. The number of articles which would remain on the customs tariff would be forty-eight, and next year forty-four; spirits, tea, tobacco, sugar, wine, coffee, corn, currants, and timber being the principal, and only fifteen of the whole being retained for purposes of revenue. He expected to obtain £1,400,000 by taking up the malt and hop duties within the year.

It was impossible to escape the income tax. In order to supply the remainder of the deficit of 9,400,000 that tax would be renewed at a rate of 10d. in the pound on incomes above £150 a year, at 7d. below that sum; the tax to be taken for one year only, three-quarters of the year's rate to be collected within the year, which would give a sum of 8,472,000; and this would bring the revenue up to the expenditure, or £70,100,000, and leave a surplus of £400,000.

The right hon. gentleman concluded with an appeal to the House to support the principle of commercial reforms—for which the country had already received so much honour and reward in scattering blessing among the people of this country—and which he contended were enumerated and carried out in his financial plan. He sat down at ten minutes to nine o'clock amidst loud cheering.

Mr. DISRAELI objected to so early a consideration of the financial scheme as was proposed by Mr. Gladstone (on Thursday next), for the House was called on to deal with political as well as financial matters of the greatest importance. He thought that day fortnight was the earliest period at which the details should be brought forward.

A conversation followed, in which Mr. Ellice, Mr. Bentinck, Sir S. Northcote, Mr. Horsfall, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Palk, Mr. Alcock, and Mr. Glyn took part, the question being the period at which the discussion on the Budget should take place.

Lord PALMERSTON had no objection to fix the discussion for Friday next.

Sir J. PAKINGTON again urged a further delay.

After some further discussion on the same point, Mr. BENTINCK said that it was rumoured that the House would be told that, if this treaty were not agreed to, it would endanger our friendly relations with France. If so, the proposal would be a degrading one. He asked whether that was so, and he wished a distinct answer?

Lord J. RUSSELL said the hon. gentleman was mistaken in supposing that this treaty was imposed on this country by France; it was derived from the opinion of the Emperor of the French with regard to the advantages of free trade. It was at Mr. Cobden's request that the Government had consented to the negotiation of such a treaty, which was so calculated to promote friendly relations between the two countries. As to what the effect of its rejection would be the hon. gentleman was as capable of judging as any Minister. It was not his intention to bring on the Reform Bill at a time when it would interfere with the discussion on the Budget. He thought Friday was the latest day to which that discussion should be delayed.

After still further discussion, Lord PALMERSTON consented to take the first debate on Monday week.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS.—Lord CRANWORTH, in answer to Lord Chelmsford, said that he did not intend to refer the Endowed Schools Bill to a Select Committee.

SAVOY.—The Marquis of NORMANBY moved for a return of all the communications which have passed between the Foreign Secretary and our Ambassador at Paris relative to the annexation of Savoy from July to January last.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES.—Lord CHELMSFORD moved the second reading of the Indictable Offences Bill, which is a measure for the abolition of grand juries within the metropolitan districts, and went at length into the arguments which have been used on a former occasion.—No opposition was made, and the bill was read a second time.

THE RED RIVER SETTLEMENT.—The Earl of CARNARVON inquired what were the intentions of the Government with regard to the administration of the Red River settlement, and those parts of the Saskatchewan district recommended by a Committee of the House of Commons to be withdrawn from the Hudson's Bay Company?—The Duke of NEWCASTLE said that no steps had been taken in the matter, but he hoped it would be shortly definitively settled.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.—Lord EBURY presented a petition from the inhabitants of St. George's-in-the-East, its object being to ask the adoption of some means of putting an end to the disturbance which existed in that parish by means of some cheap and summary remedy of the grievances complained of.—The Bishop of EXETER defended Mr. Bryan King and the conduct he had pursued, urging that he had done nothing contrary to the law.—The Bishop of LONDON said he was glad to say that the services in St. George's had passed off quietly on last Sunday night. The proceedings of Mr. King had been left to his discretion by the late Bishop of London. He expressed his opinion that the present ecclesiastical law was sufficient to meet any case with regard to the use of vestments by clergymen of the Church, and, if the clergy would place the matter in his hands, he felt confident that he could bring the church back to a satisfactory condition.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

New writs were moved for the borough of Ennis, in the room of Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald, who has accepted a judgeship in Ireland; and for the county of Cork, in the room of Mr. Deasy, who has been removed from the solicitor-generalship to the attorney-generalship for Ireland, vacated by Mr. Fitzgerald.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.—In answer to Sir J. Pakington, Lord J. RUSSELL said the English and French commissioners sent to Newfoundland with respect to the fisheries had made recommendations which had been satisfactory to the Government with regard to the questions long at issue between the two Governments, but no definite conclusion had been come to by the French.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.—In answer to Mr. Horsman, Lord PALMERSTON said that there was no item in the Army Estimates which applied to the plans recommended by the commission on the national defences.

OUR RELATIONS WITH CHINA.—On the motion for going into supply, Mr. B. Cochrane called attention to the state of the relations of this country with China. The hon. gentleman gave a narrative of the events which suceeded the Treaty of Tien-Tsin, down to the attack by the Peiho forts upon the expedition under the command of Admiral Hope, and censured Lord Elgin and Mr. Bruce with some severity. He admitted that there must be some demonstration made in China in order to restore our prestige in that country, but he would have it great in moderation as well as in extent, and he would urge that the demand for a resident Minister at Pekin should not be insisted on.—Sir M. SEYMOUR entered into a statement explanatory of his conduct when in the command of the naval forces in China on the breaking out of the hostilities arising out of the dispute of the lorcha the Arrow, giving a personal narrative of his proceedings then and subsequently, especially defending himself against strictures which had been passed on him. He believed that the expedition now in progress would be successful, but he trusted that the question in dispute might be settled without hostilities, for really China was not a country with which this country ought to go to war.—Lord J. RUSSELL doubted whether this was an opportunity when the question of China could be properly discussed. Alluding to Mr. Bruce, he said that gentleman had conformed in every particular to the instructions forwarded to him; and, under all the circumstances, it was the duty of the Government to state to Mr. Bruce that he retained their confidence. The Government had come to the unanimous resolution that whatever terms they offered it was necessary to show strength in China. They could not ask for less than the ratification of the Treaty of Tien-Tsin, and an apology for what had occurred in entrapping the British Ambassador into an ambuscade. He quite agreed that the Chinese should be treated with all justice and moderation. It had been under consideration whether some person of higher authority than Mr. Bruce, and unconnected with the recent occurrences, should be employed in carrying on future negotiations, and as soon as the next mail arrived he should be prepared to state the course the Government proposed to take.—Sir J. PAKINGTON thought that this was not a convenient opportunity for discussing the question of our relations with China; but, declining to go into the subject, he wished it to be understood that he did not concur in all that Lord J. Russell had stated with regard to Mr. Bruce.—After some observations from Sir De Lacy Evans, Lord PALMERSTON urged the postponement of further discussion on the subject.—Sir C. NAPIER, in justification of Admiral Hope, read a letter from an officer giving an account of his conduct in the action at the Peiho, after being severely wounded. He urged that the Admiral ought to have the Victoria Cross.

SAVOY AND NICE.—Mr. A. KINGLAKE, with great reluctance, consented to withdraw his motion on the subject of France and Savoy, in answer to an appeal from Lord Palmerston to that effect. He hoped that a time would be fixed for bringing it on, so that it should not be brought on in vain, as he had heard that the 20th of this month had been fixed for the annexation in question, and he was asked to bring on his motion on the 28th.

After some further discussion the House went into Committee of Supply.

THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

Lord C. PAGET brought forward the Navy Estimates. He expressed his sense of the responsibility of moving estimates nearly as large as those during the Russian war. Apart from the navies of other countries, it was necessary for this country, with her colonies and commerce, to keep up for the police of the seas a considerable naval service, and no disarmament of other countries would justify our denuding ourselves of a naval force. But still we must also consider the state of the navies of other nations; nor should it be forgotten that the Navy was in a state of new creation, in order to regain the superiority which the introduction of steam deprived us of. The French Navy consisted of 32 ships of the line afloat and 5 building, 34 frigates afloat and 13 building, 5 iron-cased ships building, 17 corvettes afloat and 3 building, 39 gun-boats afloat and 29 building, 4 floating batteries afloat and others building, besides a large force of transports ready and in preparation. The total force was 214 steam-ships, for every one of which they could call men together in a month, so that none of them were actually in reserve. Russia had 187 steam-vessels afloat and 48 building. England had long endeavoured to establish reserves of seamen, the last being the Volunteer Reserve, which had not been very successful. Our own force in commission was 27 line-of-battle ships, 43 frigates and corvettes, 94 small vessels and gun-boats, making 164 steam-ships manned, being an increase of 46 this year. There were also the guard-ships, making a total of 244 in December last, since which one line-of-battle ship and two frigates had been added. We had at home and in the Mediterranean 27 line-of-battle ships, 14 frigates and corvettes, and 49 sloops and gun-boats—total 90; besides which we had 10 block-ships, with their tenders, all of which might be considered as for the defence of our coast. There were 55 vessels in China, besides which a large force was spread all over the world, including three line-of-battle ships. There were of vessels not in commission—48 sail of the line afloat and 11 building, 34 frigates afloat and 9 building, 9 block-ships afloat and 4 iron-cased ships building, 16 corvettes afloat and 5 building, 80 sloops afloat and 15 building, 27 small vessels afloat, 129 gun-boats afloat and 9 building, and 8 floating-batteries afloat. It was intended to launch this year 10 line-of-battle ships, 12 frigates, 4 iron-cased ships, 4 corvettes, 23 sloops, and 23 gun-boats. The vote for men asked for an increase of 8000 seamen, 1000 marines, 200 boys, and 700 coast-guard men, making 11,700 in all, which were only just sufficient to man the ships in commission and retain a reserve of seamen in the home ports amounting to 10,000. Having entered into the details of this vote, and passing over that for victualling, the noble Lord passed to vote 8, which showed an increase of £14,000 for the Admiralty, principally caused by the employment of extra clerks. The Admiralty would be ready to grant an inquiry into the expenditure of the dockyards, which were not in a satisfactory condition. With regard to the volunteer reserve of seamen, there was a delusion on the part of sailors that they were to be kidnapped, and sent into the Navy; but there was no intention of calling them out except in case of emergency. But even if there was such an intention they were not required, for the complement of our ships was full, and there was no want of sailors for manning our fleets. The noble Lord went minutely through each vote, pointing out the increase in each. Among other things he showed that in the last year the Admiralty had built in the dockyards 36,278 tons of ships of war, and they proposed to build this year 39,934 tons. They were building steam-engines to the extent of 18,200 horse-power. There were four iron-cased ships building; two of them of 6039 tons and 1200 horse-power, and two smaller, of 3268 tons each. The total cost for building by contract was £1,355,807, including machinery, over and above the ships building in the dockyards. He concluded by moving the first vote, that of the number of seamen—85,500 men.

After a discussion in which Sir J. Pakington, Sir C. Napier, and Mr. Whitbread took the principal part,

Mr. W. LINDSAY moved that the Chairman report progress, urging that the question against whom those large amounts were directed should be put, discussed, and answered.

The vote for the number of men was, however, agreed to; as was the vote for their wages and victualling.

The House then resumed, and the other orders of the day were disposed of.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

THE PEIHO.—The Earl of MALMESBURY, in reference to a statement of Lord J. Russell in the other House, on the previous night, on the subject of Mr. Bruce having directed the forcing of the Peiho in accordance with instructions from him, dissented from the statement, and gave notice that on Tuesday, the 21st inst., he would state the exact instructions he had given.

AFFAIRS OF ITALY.

The Marquis of NORMANBY moved an address to the Crown asking for any instructions given by the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to the English Chargé d'Affaires at Florence, who is not accredited to the Provisional Government, directing him to attend the reception, on the 1st of January, of Signor Buoncompagni, who is now acting as Governor-General of Tuscany, without any sanction on the part of the Tuscan people; and also a return of the dates of all communications between the Foreign Office and our Ambassador at Paris on the subject of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France up to the 1st of January. In doing so he referred at length to the state of Italian affairs, and reiterated the arguments with which he has on several occasions already favoured the House.

Earl GRANVILLE, after a general defence of the conduct of the Government, designated the motion of Lord Normanby as irregular, if not unprecedented, but at the same time there was no objection to granting the returns.

The Earl of MALMESBURY was sorry that the Government had not, as their predecessors had done, laid fully before Parliament, during their progress, statements of the mode in which the affairs of Italy had been dealt with. He trusted that the Government would adhere to the policy of non-intervention which had been adopted by the late Government. It was his desire to see Italy formed into a great Power, but he hoped that such an object would never be attained if it was gained at the expense of the annexation of Savoy to France.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE expressed his decided belief, looking to the course of recent events and the strong expression of public opinion in England, that no attempt would be made to annex Savoy and Nice to France.

The Earl of DERBY was of opinion that events on the Continent were assuming an aspect of the greatest gravity. He wished to know if the papers laid before the House of Commons relating to the annexation of Savoy to France contained the latest information on the subject.

Earl GRANVILLE said he had nothing further to communicate.

The Earl of ELLENBOROUGH expressed strong doubts whether the King of Sardinia had any right to cede Savoy to France without the consent of the Powers which gave Savoy to him.

After some remarks from Lord WODEHOUSE and the Marquis of NORMANBY in reply,

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. W. Cowper took his seat for Hertford, and Mr. Hutt for Gateshead, on their re-election for accepting the offices of Chief Commissioner of Works and Vice-President of the Board of Trade.

Mr. A. KINGLAKE postponed his motion with reference to the annexation of Savoy to France until this day fortnight.

Mr. H. BERKELEY gave notice of a bill for establishing the ballot on an early day after the introduction of the Reform Bill.

THE SPANISH DEBT.—In answer to Lord Burghley, Lord J. RUSSELL said that the amount that Spain has agreed to repay this country was £493,000. The negotiation for its repayment was begun by Lord Malmesbury in 1858, and he had continued it. The Spanish Government had behaved with great fairness and propriety in the matter.

THE REFORM BILL.—In answer to Mr. E. James, Lord J. RUSSELL said he should endeavour to bring in the Reform Bill on Thursday, the 1st of March.

WINES AND MEDICINES FOR THE NAVY.—In answer to Lord C. Hamilton, Lord C. PAGET said that the drugs supplied to the Navy came from Apothecaries' Hall, and were therefore of the best quality. As to the wine supplied for the sick, the statement of Mr. Gladstone, that it was unfit for use, had caused some sensation at the Admiralty, and they were making inquiry on the subject.

THE FRENCH ARMY IN NORTHERN ITALY.—In answer to Mr. Griffith, Lord J. RUSSELL said that no preparation had been made for placing the French army in Northern Italy in a state ready for immediate active service.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

Mr. SPOONER (who was received with some cheering, ironical and otherwise) rose to move that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the Acts for the endowment of the College of Maynooth, with a view to the withdrawal of any endowment out of the Consolidated Fund, due regard being had to vested rights and interests. The hon. gentleman's address consisted principally of documents which he read to illustrate his main argument, that the teaching at the College of Maynooth was founded on religious error, and calculated to engender disloyalty and disaffection among its recipients.

Mr. R. LONG seconded the motion, urging that the augmentation of the grant to Maynooth was one of the first of those yieldings of principle to expediency by which Sir Robert Peel broke up the Conservative party.

Mr. P. O'BRIEN denied that this was a religious question, and urged that no case had been made out for the withdrawal of the grant.

Mr. HENNESSY denied the charge made by Mr. Spooner of disloyalty against the priests of Ireland, and especially during the recent meetings in that country, and he read extracts from speeches from the Archbishops and Bishops expressive of their loyalty to the Crown. If Mr. Spooner were prepared to give up tithes in Ireland, and the regium donum, he would promise him that the grant to Maynooth would be given up also.

Mr. CARDWELL urged that the principle laid down by Mr. Spooner for the withdrawal of this grant would equally apply to the exclusion of all Roman Catholics from participation in the Parliamentary grant for education. He trusted that by an immediate and decided division the House would check this first step towards unsettling the religious institutions of the country.

Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Hadfield having spoken against the continuance of the grant, each from his own peculiar point of view, the latter amidst considerable interruption,

A division was taken, and the motion was rejected, the numbers being—for the motion, 128; against it, 186.

TRINITY AND ST. JOHN'S COLLEGES, CAMBRIDGE.

Mr. POLLARD-URQUHART moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to withhold her consent from certain portions of the statutes of Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge, now before Parliament, relating to the compulsory retirement of the college master, the compulsory celibacy of the senior fellows, the removal of fellows who may have openly seceded from the Church of England, the filling up of the vacant places in the seniority by the master and the remaining seniors, and the delegating to the master and seniors exclusively all rules respecting the attendance of the undergraduates who are not members of the Church of England at the college chapel; and that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give such directions as to her may seem fit to refer the above-mentioned statutes to the Cambridge University Commissioners.

Mr. BAINES seconded the motion. He urged that Dissenters should be allowed to enjoy the fellowships and scholarships to which they secured by merit, and which were unconnected with ecclesiastical functions.

Lord PALMERSTON said that the regulations of the Cambridge University had no competency under the Act of 1856, under which they were instituted, to deal with the case of the fellowships and scholarships which were the members of the Church of England. The only mode of settling that question would be to refer it to Parliament, as by Act of Parliament they were originally created. If it had been proposed by any of the commissioners to give a license for celebrating at chapel, on the ground of conscientious objections, it would not have been within their power to have carried their object. He had no alternative but to oppose the motion.

Mr. WALPOLE said that the questions involved in the motion had been deliberately and properly considered, discussed, and disposed of in Parliament, and it was very inconvenient to raise them again in the form of the present motion.

After a few words from Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. NEWDEGATE the motion was withdrawn.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Mr. CLIVE obtained leave to bring in a bill for the regulation and inspection of mines.

Mr. WARBURTON obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the Medical Acts.

Lord C. PAGET brought up the report on Supply.

The Valuation of Rateable Property (Ireland) Bill passed through Committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

CORRECT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT (1854) AMENDMENT BILL.—Mr. MELLOR moved the second reading of this bill. Mr. Mellor addressed gentlemen said that he had received a number of letters from various parts of the country complaining of the operation of the Act, and requesting the introduction of the bill, and asserting that the country was far more alive to the evils of lotteries than it had been before the passing of the present Act. He knew from those letters was that the most efficient check would be to inflict a degrading punishment on the lottery gambler, and not merely a fine, as at present bill, by arming the Court with power to sentence a person convicted of lottery to the pillory or whipping-post, at the option of the party suffering six months.—Mr. HUME seconded the motion.—Sir F. Goldsmid objected to the provisions of the bill, and thought the present Act required consolidation. If it was a return to the antiquated legislation of fifty years ago. In his opinion the only effectual lottery remedy was to be found in the temptation and render the punishment certain.—Mr. Collier and Mr. Stuart Bayley spoke in favour of the measure.—Mr. Bellew, on behalf of the Solicitor-General, together with the bill which had been introduced by Sir Fitzroy Kelly, and which proposed to abolish the law altogether, and take the operation of the Act of 1854. He was inclined to think, with Sir F. Goldsmid, that there was room for some consolidation of the present Act, and that the promoters of the bill, as it might have the effect of deterring juries from convicting.—Mr. Ayrton supported the motion of the right hon. gent. to defer and withdrew the bill.—Mr. E. JAMES then moved that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Act of 1854 entitled the Public Prevention Act, and to report whether any, and if any, what, further means were necessary to prevent the practice of lotteries.—Mr. Bellew, as far as his opinion, as the result of his experience in conducting cases before election committees, was that the Act of 1854 was a dead letter. Mr. Hennessy thought that the Act of 1854 had been a failure. Although it had not entirely suppressed, it had greatly diminished, the extent of lotteries. He was for the approve of excessive punishment, as he thought nothing could be more injudicious than to revert a person convicted of lottery to the pillory.—Several suggestions relating to subjects to be referred to the Committee were made in the course of the discussion, and ultimately the motion for the motion was agreed to.

The Turnpike Trusts Arrangements Bill (1845) amendment Bill (second reading) was postponed in consequence of the illness of the Home Secretary.

The Administration of Relief Bill was read a second time.

The Tramways (Ireland) Bill was referred to a Select Committee.

The Union Relief Act (1849) Amendment Bill passed.

WAYS AND MEANS.—The following resolution was agreed to in Committee of Ways and Means:—"That for the purpose of making good the supply granted to her Majesty for the deficiency in the grants for the service of the year ended on the 31st day of March, 1859, the sum of £1,000,000 be issued out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

THE STATE OF THE COUNTRY—ADDRESS.

The EARL of ABERDEEN moved for copies of any correspondence (in addition to that already laid before Parliament) which may have taken place between her Majesty's Government and her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries in Paris respecting the negotiation of the treaty of commerce with France.

After some conversation the motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

THE NEW REFORM BILL.

Lord J. RUSSELL gave notice of his intention, on the 1st of March, to introduce a bill to amend the representation of the people of England and Wales.

AMERICAN COASTING TRADE.—Lord J. RUSSELL, in reply to Mr. Liddell, said that the Government of the Crown had been consulted on the American law of 1848, which gave exclusive privileges to American vessels engaged in the trade between New York and California, and that it appeared it as their opinion that it could not properly be called a coasting trade. Nevertheless the privileges thus were excluded from any treaty of reciprocity in this trade, notwithstanding the professions made in 1846, on the occasion of passing the Navigation Laws, which, Mr. Gladstone, then the Minister of America here, stated to the President of the Board of Trade, "If you give us the whole trade—if you give us the whole of the coasting trade, if you give all, we will give all." In 1854 we threw open our coasting trade, and we received in American Government no gift, and provoked no return. That Government, however, replied that the terms of their Constitution they could not grant the coasting trade.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC'S DUKE.—Mr. M. GIBSON, in reply to Mr. Hubbard, said, from communications received, he understood that it was not the intention of the Rossa Company any longer to place any dues upon the imports of the Roman Catholics.

THE ANNEXATION QUESTION.—Sir R. PEEL asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether her Majesty's Government saw any objection to state the nature of the communications which had passed between the Government and the Government with respect to Savoy, and a portion of the Sardinian territory to France; and, also, whether her Majesty's Government had received any proposition with respect to the Swiss Government the opinion entertained by other Powers on this subject; and whether, in the event of the cession of Savoy to France, it was the intention her Majesty's Government were prepared to abandon the neutralized Switzerland, as guaranteed by the Treaties of Vienna, which were signed by Sardinia.

—Lord J. RUSSELL said that the Sardinian Government, in reply to a communication from the Queen's Government, stated that they were willing to consent to the cession of Savoy to France, and that they disapproved of such an arrangement. With regard to the question of the neutrality her Majesty's Government had been asked by the Government of that country whether they were prepared to maintain the guarantee of the neutrality as settled by the treaty of 1815, and they had always said that they were prepared to do so. He had also to state to the honourable that, in the event of any cession taking place, both Sardinia and Switzerland would be consulted, and would be desirous that the portion of the province should be ceded to Switzerland. He was a little surprised at the question of the honourable gentleman, because he thought he had made the annexation of the entire province of Savoy. He was, however, sorry to say that he had that day been informed that the Government of Switzerland are Sardinia were at all desirous that any such annexation should take place.—Mr. S. FITZGERALD asked whether the noble lord had received any information from Turin respecting a communication having been made to the Sardinian Government by the Emperor of France, stating to the effect that in the event of a portion of Central Italy being annexed to Sardinia, the Emperor of the French would claim a troops to enter Savoy, in order to protect the French frontier.—Lord J. RUSSELL said he had heard nothing of any intimation that the Emperor of the French had said that, in the event of the provinces of Central Italy being annexed to Sardinia, it would be his duty to send a powerful force into Savoy. He should not think the French frontier secure unless Savoy were included within it (Sensation).

MILITARY AND NAVAL ESTIMATES.—Mr. MONSELL moved "That, in the opinion of this House, the recommendations of the Commissioners on manning the Navy ought to be taken into consideration by her Majesty's Government, with a view to carry out the principle of such recommendations." In the course of a conversation which ensued, Lord C. PAGET said he had no intention of opposing the Commission, as the Government were most desirous of facilitating the manning of the Navy and of carrying out the recommendations of the Commission as far as they could. In regard to the several measures for the creation of a naval reserve, it was not intended as a final measure in the way of improvement. He was not inclined to think the following under which the men laboured at first—namely, that the moment they entered they would be liable for foreign service—was disappearing, and the men were now coming forward in sufficient numbers.

PASSING OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.—Mr. WILLIAMS, having moved for returns on the subject, called attention to this practice with a view of showing that the punishment bet much increased within the last year in both services, and that it ought to be given up.—Mr. BERNAL thought that the punishment of flogging in the Army and Navy was impolitic and ought to be abolished.—Lord C. PAGET assented to the returns moved for with the exception of the titles of the ships and the names of the Captains about whom the returns were made, and to the number of lashes inflicted.—After some discussion the motion of Mr. Williams as modified was agreed to.

MUSIC.

THE proceedings of the Royal English Opera, our only musical theatre at this time, afford very little food for criticism. On Friday (last week) "The Crown Diamonds" was performed to a crowded audience, among whom there were a great number of people of rank and fashion. This master work of Auber never fails to attract; it is not only one of the most charming comic operas in existence, but it displays to more advantage than any other Miss Louisa Pyne's fine qualities as a singer and actress, and the strength of the excellent company of this theatre. Vincent Wallace's "Lurline" is still in posse; it is now high time it were in esse.

Mr. Hullah's concert at St. Martin's Hall, on Wednesday evening, consisted of Mozart's Symphony in G minor, No. 4, and Beethoven's Choral Symphony. The mass, though carefully got up and executed, fully well performed, was but coldly received. Mozart is a composer of considerable reputation, who has produced several successful operas for the Parisian stage; though his essay in this branch of composition in this country, in 1785, at the opening of the Royal Italian Opera eight or nine years ago, was a signal failure. The French school of ecclesiastical music has never been good, and M. Gounod has done but little towards its improvement. This mass is certainly written with artistic elearness and correctness, but it seldom rises above common-place. There is nothing in it approaching real and trivial both in its melody and harmony, and it has none of the true ecclesiastical solemnity which distinguishes the music of the early Church ought to possess. Mr. Hullah has done well to make the English public acquainted with this work, which is not without merit, but its reception on this occasion will hardly tempt him to reproduce it. Beethoven's gigantic symphony has been several times performed under Mr. Hullah's direction, and the audience showed great favour to himself, to his chorus, and to his instrumental orchestra. It was replayed to a crowded audience.

The Vocal Association gave their first subscription concert at St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening, under the direction of Mr. Benedict. The programme was miscellaneous, comprising Mendelssohn, Bishop, and F. Berger, were admirably sung by the chorus, and the instrumental pieces, Mr. Benedict's pianoforte as a rising higher and higher in public favour, charmed the audience by her beautiful performance of the solo parts of Mendelssohn's noble hymn "Hear my prayer," and Mr. Benedict's "Illusion," and of the laughing song from Auber's "Manon Lescaut." and Mdlle. Marie Taglioni's "Le Papillon" and Mdlle. Madeline Graever showed, by several admirable pianoforte performances, that she is akin to her sister in talent as well as in blood. Mr. Benedict conducted the concert with his accustomed ability.

The St. John's Wood Subscription Concert, on Monday last, under the direction of Mr. George Forbes, was an excellent instrumental performance. The singers were Miss Eliza Hughes, Miss Eyles, and Mr. George Perren; the instrumentalists were Mr. H. Blagrove and Mr. Pratten, violins; Mr. Hill, tenor; Mr. Lucas and Herr Daubert, violoncello; and Herr Pauer and Mr. Forbes, pianofortes. Mr. Blagrove's and Mr. Hill's performances on their violins were highly successful. Mr. Hill's performance on the tenor violin was, we believe, his first appearance in public, and we congratulate him on his success. Whose the gentleman is by profession we are not aware, but he is evidently a master of the instrument. Mr. Forbes's grand trio in E flat minor, violin, violoncello, played by Messrs. Pauer, Blagrove, and Daubert, Herr's grand duet for two pianos, performed by Herr Pauer and Mr. Forbes; and Spohr's concertante quartet, the principal violin part played by Mr. Blagrove, were greatly successful, carried on for a number of years by Mr. George Forbes with great and deserved success, and among the most entertaining features of their class in the metropolis. The last of the season, we observe, takes place on the 5th of March.

THE THEATRES, &c.

DRURY LANE.—A new play, in two acts, was produced on Monday last, called "Love's Triumph," translated from the M. Foll. most probably from the French. There is some ingenuity in the construction of the plot. Leonard (Mr. Leigh Murray) is one of the forest-keeper's cottage, and the snowstorm without; and the contrast is well maintained by the dialogue between him, Christian (Mr. Ryder), and Christian's wife, Lenore (Miss Fitzwilliam), the latter of whom entreats him to return to his comrades, whom he has left in the wintry night awaiting the mail; but his firmness of purpose keeps his stay, somewhat to her annoyance. Not that she has an intrigue on hand; but she is bent on affording a temporary shelter to one Jeremy (Mr. Compton), a Royalist (Mr. Stoakley), who, it is the year 1792, when visiting the neighbourhood to receive his farm rents. Then there is Duchamp (Mr. Phelps), a wealthy farmer, to whom Jeremy, who is sympathetically impelled to communicate his own state of misery, flies for protection, and provides with a suit of clothes that he may join the Republican soirée after he has infected him with suspicion. Mr. Duchamp narrowly escapes being shot by the indignant husband, whom he finds at his house, and who has come to seek his wife for the army. Seventeen years afterwards all the parties are again found in the neighbourhood of the forest-keeper's cottage, now mobbed and insulted, and Christian seeks for refuge in a fine house inhabited by Duchamp. Supposing the former to have been slain in battle, Lenore accepted the hand of Duchamp, who is now a widower, her daughter (Miss F. Thirlwall), who first meets with Christian, is charged to keep his visit secret, however explained by the circumstances. Christian is deeply affected; but resolves on still concealing his identity, and, when Lenore finds him unknown, and he discovers that Duchamp, true to his Royalist principles, has prohibited the poor girl's marriage with a democratic lover. This rescues all interest from the piece, which, however, terminates by the means of saving Duchamp's life, he presumes on the fact as stated by Jeremy in the commencement of the piece that Christian is dead. Here the play might have ended, but that some comic business, in which Mr. Compton, Mr. Stoakley, and Mr. Ryder, as the farmer's daughter (Miss F. Thirlwall), who first meets with Christian, is charged to keep his visit secret, however explained by the circumstances. Christian is deeply affected; but resolves on still concealing his identity, and, when Lenore finds him unknown, and he discovers that Duchamp, true to his Royalist principles, has prohibited the poor girl's marriage with a democratic lover. This rescues all interest from the piece, which, however, terminates by the means of saving Duchamp's life, he presumes on the fact as stated by Jeremy in the commencement of the piece that Christian is dead. Here the play might have ended, but that some comic business, in which Mr. Compton, Mr. Stoakley, and Mr. Ryder, as the farmer's daughter (Miss F. Thirlwall), who first meets with Christian, is charged to keep his visit secret, however explained throughout, and the drama so far proved successful.

NEW ADELPHI.—A change has at length occurred in the pet companions of the Britannia. Mr. Webster, who has withdrawn, and in "The House, or the Home," were received by the audience with a hearty welcome. Mr. Webster, though he has withdrawn from "The Dead Heart" at the Adelphi, has hardly not with drawn himself from the boards, and revived for the occasion "One Touch of Nature," which he has performed with much spirit. No pen theatrical copyist with his usual power, but exhibited in minute portraiture, with individual realism. The pieces were well approved by a crowded audience.

ST. JAMES'S.—A new burlesque was produced at this theatre on Saturday, and by a new candidate for stage honours. Mr. F. C. Burnand is the name of the author; that of his piece being "Dido," the heroine of Virgil's epic. When we state that Mr. Charles Young was the Carthaginian Queen, Miss Wyndham sister Anne, who is made her Majesty's rival in the affections of the Trojan wanderer, and Miss Clara St. Casse Enea, the reader will have some notion of the wild work which is made of the original story. Mr. Burnand is, however, not so much to be censured as some of his predecessors; and the dialogue, in fact, is of a somewhat level character. We have, nevertheless, to record a success.

STRAND.—A new drama, by Mr. Wooler, has been produced at this theatre. It is entitled "Sisterly Service," and turns upon a curious incident. The hero is one Adolphe de Valmont (Mr. W. H. Swanborough), one of the King's musketeers, who has to keep guard at the palace on the night appointed for an assignation, and who seeks his sister's aid to rid him of his difficulty. Rosalie de Valmont (Miss Maria Simpson) accordingly consents to assume his uniform, and to do duty for him as sentinel. At this juncture the young Dauphin, bent on some adventure, sends to borrow the boots, hat, and cloak of the musketeer on guard. The young lady has to submit to the demand. Her case is made worse by the interference of Count Jolicœur (Mr. G. Vincent), who threatens her with exposure unless she consents to accept his hand. During his temporary absence, however, she manages to escape, and her brother, in a similar state of declinet apparel, takes her place. She is, therefore, "cutting down all the fine two-year olds in his last year's campaign," and other such well assertions; but they decline to make his very sensible views. Buccaneer is as well as horse can be, and 13 to 1 is no price. Loophole is running up splendidly, and 6 to 1 will not. Mr. Parr has also intimated to such of the sporting papers as will permit its spelling the name with three "t's" that he hopes for the future "they will not class me as a pedestrian." Lamb without better informed on the subject." The late Lord Londesborough's horses are trained at the Duke's stables, the Summer Hill, Malton, the winner of the last Oaks, was sold for 800 guineas to Mr. Naylor, of Cheshire, who has also purchased Buccaneer, a stud of late. Gavazzi, a fine, upstanding fifteen-three two-year old, by Weasel—Malvina, with the remnant of a blister on his hock, was purchased by Lord Stamford for 420 gs. at Mr. Merry's sale. Mr. Parr has also by Auber to Ellington, and very like him, joined company at precisely the same sum. Mr. Merry's sale realized if sold 1000 gs., was the severe price sat on each of them at Doncaster last autumn; but now, unfortunately, their principal engagements are void. It is many a long year since so many horses have come with such a lot of two-year olds as Lord Stamford. The returns of the postponed Lincoln meeting have not yet been published. Nottingham Races take the Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of next week for their spring meeting.

A new horse-tamer, of the name of Pratt, from Texas, has come over to England, and given much satisfaction by his performances with four savage colts at Tattersall's and Liverpool. One of his plans, we believe, is, when the horse is a kicker, to fasten its most wicked leg by a strap to its shoulder, so that it can only use the two under each time it indulges. This reminds one of the old specific of presenting a hot leg of mutton to a biter. He candidly states that his secret of treatment is kindness. Mr. Rarey's is said to be the system of kindness will only do up to a certain point.

Wednesday, March 7, will be the day on which we are the guests of the Watering meeting. It is supposed that Lord Sefton will, if possible send Sumpter; Mr. Naylor, Buccaneer; Mr. Merry, Gavazzi; Mr. Jaques, Jura; Mr. Oates, Middleham; Mr. Pascoe, Pearl; Mr. Cattrell, Attermire; Mr. Knowles, Breach-Loader; Mr. Rendall Pigon; Mr. Richard Peck, Hermitage; Mr. A. Peck, Sweetbriar; Sydney Liner; Mr. Gibson, Ayrshire Laddie; Mr. Jardine, Sadyn (who finished his race on Monday last year as Colwyn's Dam's colt). Maid of the Mill and Bridegroom; Lord Grey de Wilton, Greek Fire or Gil Blas; Mr. Campbell, Canaradoc; while Captain Spencer, Mr. Swinburne and Mr. Stapylton Grimston will probably appear at the plains of Altear, takes his chance with Skittles.

Frost has been the order of the day, and days that we have to frank hunting news to offer. The Badminton have well earned a little rest, up to Friday last they had hunted 113 days and killed 49 brace of foxes. We thought that the hard-riding Cheshire club of last week was not likely to lack a rejoinder, and with the following extract from a letter of one of our correspondents we have:—"A correspondent observes —"I think it right to say that the practice of overriding hounds has not been at all faithfully carried out for many years past, and during Mr. White's mastership, as every one in the county knows, it caused him and the members of the hunt very great annoyance. When the huntsman is compelled to ride his whip to get a fair start for his hounds and for himself, I may safely affirm that the practice of some half a dozen for the field is regardless of him or them. I find that the chief cause of the over-riding hounds arises from the hounds not being laid on to the line of the fox when the moment, considering the necessary means of doing so; while the ambition of being in the van leads the few to destroy the sport, which he may would otherwise afford to the many assembled." Some more note to hunting and general literature by the publication of Mr. Asshetou Smith's Vade, from the pen of his intimate friend Sir J. E. Eardley Wilmot, Bart.

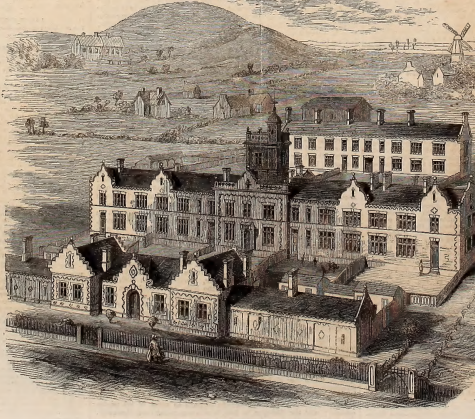
PITY THE SORROWS OF POOR THUFFLE-HUNTERS.—The following petition has been presented to the House of Commons:—"By the undersigned Poor Men of the parish of Winterslow, in the county of Wilts, "Humbly sheweth, That your petitioners are Thuffle-hunters by profession. Petition. Being poor labouring men, mostly with families and aged, and living in a wood country, they have always found it a very good and English truffles grow, which we cannot find without dogs, we do therefore humbly pray that your honourable House will pass a law and order that no other purpose; and, as it is in the winter season of the year when we suffer them, when labourers in general are out of work, and receive but 9 or 10 shillings per year, and as we have to keep our dogs six months when we have no use for them, we humbly pray that your honourable House we shall in most cases be obliged to make a sacrifice of our dogs, and thereby become a burden to the parish, or else starve ourselves and families; and, as it did please your humble House in its wisdom to exempt dogs used for sheep from the tax, we humbly pray that your honourable House will take off the tax, we do humbly beg that your humble House will take our case into your kind consideration, and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, that we may be enabled to follow our avocation for ours and families sake, and your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray."—[Signed by a dozen WILLIAM YATES, &c.; WILLIAM HARDAWAY, &c., &c. &c.]

EFFECTS OF THE LATE REVIVAL.—The religious movement continues and it was stated by both friends and foes that time would test its genuineness. The test has been applied in the form of a season of local wanting. In Derry, and in many other parts of Ulster, the additional religious excitement which was superadded to the ordinary fervour of Christmas week are well attended. Some may have lapsed into careless habits, but the mass of converts remain steadfast in their zeal, and their lives are becoming stronger. The river of Christianity flows on with deep and silent course. Many hitherto unbelievers have been led to the Saviour's feet, and by public men, and we are happy to learn that additional testimony of a most satisfactory character given by William Armstrong, Esq., Q.C., Assistant Barrister, at the late Coleraine Quarter Sessions. Referring to the small number of cases on the calendar, he added—"How is such a gratifying state of things to be accounted for? It must be from the improved state of the morality of the people. I believe I can fully warrant now to say that to nothing else than the moral and religious movement which commenced early last summer can the change be attributed. I can trace the state of your calendar to nothing else. It is a matter of great gratification when we see the type of this country improving, and I trust that no temptations of any sort will arise by which they can be induced to forsake the paths of rectitude." This testimony is eminently gratifying, especially as it comes from one would expect that the revival movement actually increased crime.—Derry Standard.

PORT OF TANGIER.—FROM A SKETCH BY H. J. JOHNSON.—SEE PAGE 152.

THE LATE DR. TODD.

THIS eminent physiologist and physician has been suddenly removed from the sphere of his labours, just as he had attained the zenith of his fame, and when his great and varied experience was being most widely employed in the exercise of his beneficent profession.



The son of a distinguished surgeon and professor in Dublin, whose sudden and early death, likewise in the full tide of professional success, spread a gloom over that city and evoked universal regret and sympathy, Dr. Todd graduated at Trinity College, and came to London as a young man, with nothing but his own energy and character to rely on for pushing his fortunes in this metropolis. He first contemplated practising as a surgeon, but finally took an ad eundem degree at Oxford, and joined the College of Physicians. From the first he had shown the strongest taste for anatomical and physiological pursuits, which he followed with uncommon ardour, and became a lecturer on these subjects in the schools. They were the foundation of his subsequent success, giving to his thoughts and views that sound practical tone so much in harmony with the force of his own character, and which impressed itself so strongly on the medical doctrines of the day. It has been a distinctive feature of English anatomists and physiologists that they have for the most part kept steadily in view the application of these sciences to the investigation and treatment of disease. That practical turn of mind which so characterises our countrymen has led here, as in so many other walks to remarkable results, and no better instances could be adduced than that of the subject of this notice. He looked on all disease as one thoroughly conversant with the several avenues and processes of the body deranged by it, and was thus enabled not only to see comprehensively and to teach decidedly the phenomena before him, but with all the energy of a wonderfully active mind to take a leading part in moulding the theories and practice that were current in his youth into conformity with the requirements of an epoch in which physiology has made greater strides towards the perfection of a science than in all former periods combined. He did not look at diseased processes merely as such, but at disease in contrast with health, and he had the courage to write and teach fearlessly the conclusions to which he was led, but always with simplicity, honesty, and candour.

Soon after coming to London Dr. Todd projected a work of great extent and reputation—the "Cyclopædia of Anatomy and Physiology," which, after many years of tedious delays, was completed under his editorship, he himself having contributed to it many important articles. He also was joint author with Mr. Bowman of the "Physiological Anatomy and Physiology of Man," a work which contained some new views and is well known among men of science. He was the author of many other works. After being appointed Professor of Physiology and of General and Morbid Anatomy in King's College, in 1837, he took a leading part in originating King's College Hospital, an institution which is largely indebted to him for its rapid progress under great difficulties, and from which he had been mournfully forced to retire only two months ago by the extent of his private engagements and the painful consciousness of failing health.

In the midst of work so incessant—literary, educational, and among active men of business—his gradually augmenting practice left him no leisure; yet, so long ago as 1847, he circulated a document among some friends, including the late Bishop Blomfield, which led to the foundation of St. John's Training Institution for Nurses—an institution that supplied Miss Nightingale with some of that first devoted band which left England for Scutari in October, 1855, and which has now for some years, as a portion of its duties, in addition to private nursing, performed all the nursing in King's College Hospital.

Dr. Todd's last illness was painfully sudden, and illustrates the laborious employments which a London physician in the highest department of practice must undertake. Having been summoned to Wales, he slept on his way home, on Sunday night, the 29th of January last, at Gloucester, and on waking next morning felt ill. He, however, reached his residence in Brook-street at noon, and thought himself able to see and prescribe for a few cases of urgency. At two o'clock he was seized, in his consulting-room, with hemorrhage from the stomach, so severe as to prostrate him, and it continued to recur to such an extent as to terminate his life soon after eight o'clock, in the fifty-first year of his age.

Dr. Todd has left a widow and four children. On the 4th inst. a large number of his professional colleagues and friends followed the remains to their last resting-place at Kensal-green Cemetery.

BIRDSEYE VIEW OF SCARBOROUGH NEW WORKHOUSE.

SCARBOROUGH NEW WORKHOUSE.

AMONG the improvements lately carried out in Scarborough is workhouse, which has recently been erected, situated in Deansstreet, leading to the Cemetery. The group of buildings will accommodate from two hundred to three hundred inmates. The front range is for boardroom, offices, &c.; the entrance gateway forming a pleasing feature, being composed of moulded white bricks with a bold keystone over, which is a large shield with the Scarborough arms carved in high relief. The governor's apartments occupy a central position, and are so arranged that he possesses the fullest command of, and is in the closest approximation with, every ward of the establishment. These apartments are also crowned by a tower which furnishes a very efficient system of ventilation. The infirmary at the back is appropriately on the highest part of the ground (being nearly twenty feet higher than the front), and is thoroughly well lighted and ventilated; and, although the building, as a whole, is free from the expensive ornamental decoration that too often characterises similar establishments, it possesses, from the artistic mixture of brickwork, a most attractive and substantial appearance. The whole of the buildings are well supplied with water and lighted with gas; and these advantages, coupled with a capital system of drainage, make the sanitary regulations all that could be desired. The works have been erected from designs furnished by Messrs. George and Henry Styan, architects, York, under whose direction they have been successfully carried out.

THE PARIS NEW BARRIERS.

In our Number of December 10 last we gave several illustrations of the Barriers of Paris of 1859, previously to the extension of the city limits to the fortifications, decreed to take place on the 1st of January, 1860. We now present our readers with an en-urban View of one of the new barriers, that of Montrouge, so called from the district, which was formerly one of the suburbs of the French capital, but now constituting a part of the city. The number of the new barriers is of course more considerable than before, on account of the increase in the circumference of the capital: of the old barriers there were fifty-five, whereas the new ones reckon sixty-four. It will be seen by our Engraving that the new constructions have no pretensions whatever as architectural ornaments, it having been considered necessary to render them subordinate to the glacis of the fortifications by the side of which they have been erected. The opening in the rampart is occupied by an iron railing and gateways, through which New Paris is entered. The barriers have been constructed by the military engineers, and are nearly all on the same plan, consisting of a ground floor for the offices based on iron girders, which serve for the ceiling of the commodious cellars underneath. Behind is a small courtyard, looking on to the boulevard that forms the first interior line of the enlarged city. The walls are of stone, and the roofs have all been made bomb-proof.

It is intended to build dwellings for the employés of the Octroi in the immediate neighbourhood of each barrier; and, as there are many parts of the new city near the fortifications comparatively deserted, their habitations will form the nucleus of fresh quarters, the order and safety of which will be guaranteed by the proximity of the officers of the Octroi, whose patrols will be constantly going their rounds to prevent smuggling.

The extension of the city of Paris has given rise to a great number of inevitable complications, arising out of the difficulties accompanying such an important measure. To the different factories established within the circle of the new Parisian limits an Imperial decree, published on the 20th of December, has wisely granted numerous immunities from duties for various periods; otherwise the success of their future commercial operations, based upon the cheaper rate of the raw material and of fuel out of Paris, would have been altogether compromised. But the same decree, while protecting the just interests of those whom the recent improvement was never intended to endanger, has, with equal wisdom, ordained that the sordid expectations of a host of speculators in wine shall not be realised.

As soon as the intention to extend the limits of the city became public immense purchases of wine were made and brought within the enceinte continuë des fortifications, in the hope that they would be exonerated from the dues if delivered before the 1st of January, 1860; and to such an extent were these speculations carried that cellars formerly of little value were let at exorbitant rates, and the market price of wine increased at least fifty per cent. But the golden dreams of the wholesale winebolders were not to be realised. On the 1st of January all the wine on which duty had not been paid had to undergo the visit of, and pay the customary tribute to, the toll-collector. Private individuals who had only made a reasonable provision of the vinous element were not called upon to pay, provided they engaged to keep their little stock exclusively for their own consumption.

It is not easy to give a complete idea of the great amount of alteration to which the extension of the city of Paris will give rise. The police has been increased to 4500 men of all grades; the number of cabs and omnibuses is to be augmented; the gas and water companies, formerly distinct for the districts, intra and extra muros, will have to be reorganised; and even the interment enterprise is affected by the new arrangement. All these, and many other interests, it has been difficult to conciliate, but the firm and sage steps taken by the Government and by the municipal administration have rendered popular an alteration which had often before been mooted, but which the "powers that were" did not feel themselves energetic or courageous enough to carry out. The fortifications are now, de facto, the natural boundary of the French capital: constructed with a different intention, it is pleasing to see them receive such a peaceful and commercial application, from which we heartily trust they may never be disturbed. In any case, however, the extension of the city of Paris is among the most important and beneficial measures hitherto carried into execution by the Imperial Government, and we are convinced that future historians of the French nation will regard it as one of the greatest glories of the reign of Napoleon III., so rich in the achievement of plans tending to improve and embellish the French capital.

MONTROUGE, ONE OF THE NEW BARRIERS OF PARIS.

DEMOLITION OF THE WALL OF PARIS.

The destruction of the Paris wall, commenced almost immediately after the 1st of January, the date of the extension of the limits of the city to the fortifications, is now completed throughout the entire distance over which it extended; and a new series of colossal boulevards, fifteen miles in extent, is thus created in what is now the interior of Paris. In order to explain how such a vast extent of wall has disappeared in so short a time, it should be stated that the work has been subdivided among a great number of contractors, who have employed the means shown in our Illustration for upsetting the barrier which had existed for the respectable period of upwards of three quarters of a century. A wide breach was made in the wall at regular distances, and against the inner side were then placed two beams supported by two others fixed into the ground; as soon as this preparation was terminated, a large instrument called a cric was put against another beam placed transversely, and a few turns of the powerful machine sufficed to upset each separate mass, of which a thick cloud of dust announced the fall. The noise caused by the old fiscal tyrant's descent was not great, and may be described by the adaptation of a jeu-de-mots employed on another occasion:

Le mur murait Paris s'en alla murmurant.

The materials will all be turned to account, most of the stone being in good condition and available for building purposes.

The view represented in our Engraving was taken by our artist at the entrance of the Rue de Clichy, and the buildings undergoing demolition in the foreground are those of the barrier of that name, an Illustration of which appeared in our Number of the 10th of December last. The hill in the background, surmounted by windmills, is the famous hill of Montmartre, from under which the large supplies of plaster of Paris have been obtained during many years. Like their neighbours the barriers, these worthy windmills, the delight of promenaders and so long the dominating object of this quarter of Paris, are also to be dislodged and removed to other spots, where, alas! the breezes may not be always so favourable to their peaceful labours.

THE LATE DR. ALEXANDER.

Not only the medical service, but the army and the country at large, have sustained a great loss in the death of Dr. Alexander, who has been taken from us in the midst of a career which promised the largest results that could be effected by untiring industry, unswerving honesty, a clear intellect, the highest practical knowledge, and the warmest sympathies with the body over which he was so recently called to preside. Thomas Alexander entered the service on the Staff in 1834, and proceeded to the West Indies, where he did duty for five years and six months, at the end of which time he came home in charge of invalids. He remained at home only nine months, when he embarked for Nova Scotia, where he did duty till he was removed, in August, 1846, as Second Class Staff Surgeon, to North America, where he served with the Rifle Brigade as Regimental Assistant Surgeon, till he embarked for the Cape of Good Hope in

DEMOLITION OF THE PARIS WALL.—THE BARRIER DE CLICHY.

1851, and served with the 60th Rifles for the next two years throughout the Kaffir war. He was principal medical officer of the expedition dispatched beyond the Kei, and he was thanked in general orders for his services throughout the war. In 1854 he was promoted to the rank of First Class Staff Surgeon, and received orders to join the Turkish expedition. He was in charge of the Light Division under Sir George Brown, and landed at Gallipoli with the first detachment of the expeditionary force, consisting of his old comrades of the Rifle Brigade, and a detachment of Royal Engineers, Sappers and Miners, on the 6th of March. With the Light Division he remained to the close of the war. At the Alma his tenderness, his inexhaustible endurance, and noble devotion in the most terrible trial to which a surgeon, overwhelmed with calls on his utmost powers, and poorly provided with the means of relief, could be exposed, were especially remarkable. At Inkerman, hour after hour, and day after day, he toiled through scenes which those who have not witnessed a battlefield and the terrors of the hospital tents can never imagine or conceive, upheld by the noblest sense of duty; and many men now alive can bear witness to the heroic calm and skill which saved life and limb for them, and the prodigality of care he bestowed on others, regardless of everything but his sacred duties. In Lord Raglan's despatch he is described "as deserving to be most honourably mentioned." All through the winter he never left his post—nay, more, from the time he joined the Light Division till the British army quitted the shores of the Crimea he never was absent from his duty a single day. On the 12th of January, 1855, he was appointed Deputy-Inspector-General, and he went to Kertch with Sir George Brown as principal medical officer of the expeditionary force. In General Codrington's despatch of March 18, 1856, in answer to an address from the House of Commons, Dr. Alexander is also mentioned, and he was recommended by Dr. Andrew Smith for promotion to the rank of Local Inspector-General for service during the Russian war. Dr. Alexander remained at home just one month and twenty-one days, when he was again ordered for service in Canada as principal medical officer, but, after performing that duty for six months, Lord Panmure nominated him one of the Royal Commissioners to inquire into the sanitary state of the Army, and he returned to England to discharge the functions of his appointment. He was also selected to draw up a new code of regulations for the management of barracks and hospitals, and, on the retirement of Sir Andrew Smith, on the 22nd of June, 1858, Dr. Alexander was appointed Director-General of the Army Medical Department, which appointment he held up to the day of his death. He was also one of the Honorary Surgeons to her Majesty, and a Companion of the Bath. A few weeks ago he was interrupted in the usual assiduous discharge of his duties by an attack of gout, complicated with an inflammatory condition of the venous system, and he died on the morning of the 1st inst., at his residence in Norfolk-square, the immediate cause of death being, it is supposed, determination of gout to the heart. He leaves a widow to mourn his loss, and in her grief she has many deep sympathisers, for few men ever had a larger number of sincere friends among those whom he admitted to his acquaintance than Dr. Alexander.

The United Service Gazette states that the account of Dr. Alexander's death was received in his native town of Prestonpans with deep and universal sorrow. This picturesque seacoast village, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, where his respected parents and immediate relatives reside, was a never-failing source of interest to him; and during the eventful life which he so earnestly devoted to the service of his country, whenever he was relieved from duty, he, with joyous feelings, returned to the home of his boyhood, and, with childlike simplicity, lived in the midst of his affectionate family, recalling the associations of his early days. As in the discharge of his public duty Dr. Alexander was always the steady friend and the champion of the soldier, in private he was ever ready, with a generous heart and a liberal hand, to minister to the necessities of the poor; and many in his native place who were relieved by him when in want and in sickness live to bless his memory. His remains were removed to Prestonpans, and laid in the family burying-ground, on the 6th inst. The scene was a most solemn one: the places of business were closed; the whole of the inhabitants followed the procession to the grave; and the fishermen—a numerous and respectable class of the community, in whom he took a deep interest—gave up their avocations at sea, to enable them to pay a last mark of respect to one whom they were proud to claim as a townsman. His body was lowered into the tomb amid the deepest manifestations of grief—all present feeling that an able man and a true Christian was lost to his country and his friends.

Whittington Club.—On Tuesday evening a public ball was given by the members of this metropolitan club, in its spacious and splendidly-decorated hall. The visitors commenced arriving at an early hour, and the dancing was kept up with great spirit and gaiety till long past midnight.

The Mishaps of a Fiery Dragon.—In the Court of Queen's Bench on Thursday week, Jim Myers, the celebrated equestrian performer, brought an action for breach of contract against Bray's Patent Traction-engine Company. The defendants paid £73 into court. Mr. Hawkins stated that in the summer of last year Jim Myers contemplated an equestrian tour in the provinces, and, in order to astonish the natives, he entered into a contract with the defendants to supply him with an engine for three months. The engine was warranted capable of conveying twenty tons at the rate of seven miles an hour. The plaintiff, in order to make the engine attractive as an exhibition, caused it to be converted, by painting and an outside covering, from a puffing, blowing, ordinary-looking engine to a fiery green dragon. The plaintiff had advertised two entertainments at Croydon. Large showbills were posted everywhere, depicting the engine with a fiery green dragon on the top, and so encased as to hide the funnel—Mr. Bray, the engine-driver, sitting on the point, with a moustache, and Jim Myers himself ready to meet an admiring populace. Myers started from Camberwell for Croydon, which was barely seven miles distant; but, to the astonishment of the plaintiff, it took ten hours to perform the journey. The plaintiff had hardly reached the town, anticipating a triumphal entrance, when the engine stuck fast in the middle of the road. His next place was Bromley, and thence on to Dartford, but after it had got a mile and a half it came to a dead stoppage. The plaintiff was consoling himself the best way he could when out came a gentleman's servant in livery, before whose house the engine had stopped, and told Mr. Myers that his master required him to take the nuisance away, or his master would do it for him. Plaintiff said it was impossible to do so. However, plaintiff had to send on his company as best he could; but they did not get to Dartford by the time advertised. On leaving Dartford the engine again broke down; he came to London and saw the directors, and at their direction he hired horses at the company's expense, whilst the engine was being repaired. The company proceeded with horses to Gravesend, and at Chatham another engine was sent to the plaintiff. He left Chatham for Maidstone, and when he had got a mile, on the top of the hill, the steerage suddenly gave way, and the engine and train ran into a bank, upset, and the thing became a total wreck. He had again to send on his performers, &c., with horses. He complained again to the directors, and a third engine was sent down. At Tunbridge Wells No. 6 engine joined them. His pace was suddenly increased to two miles and a half an hour, but it could never be kept in order. At one place it ran on one side, cut up the pavement, and the plaintiff was threatened by the local authorities for the damage done. At another time the engine ran through a brick wall, which the plaintiff had to replace; but near Dover it ran against the turnpike gate, knocked it down, and upset the gatekeeper, for which the plaintiff got into the hands of the police. The plaintiff had next to go to Newbury and Swindon. Before arriving at Newbury the engine suddenly turned off at right angles, ran through a gentleman's wall with the funnel in his drawing-room window. The gentleman rushed out, and asked him what he meant by bringing such a thing about the country; but on the plaintiff explaining the matter to him he sympathised with the plaintiff, and said he would not charge him with the damage. Myers again saw the directors, and remonstrated with them; but he could get no redress, his only chance was to keep the engine he had or go back to the rejected ones. An engine, however, was sent by train to meet him, and he and the driver fetched it from the station. They proceeded along at first very well, but on going down a slight declivity the engine started off at a terrific speed. It could not be kept straight, and it turned off as if to go across the country on a steeplechase, but ran against the bank. Myers was thrown into an oak-tree. The stoker was found with his head in the fire-box, and, on his being pulled out, he was transformed from a man with a bushy, curly head of hair to a bald-headed individual scarcely recognisable. The engine was ultimately deposited at Birmingham, where it awaits the result of law proceedings between the parties. The plaintiff, in consequence of this mishap, had brought this action, to recover compensation for losses in the performance (as he advertised three weeks before of his arrival in certain towns), from not arriving at the time advertised, and from the loss of his reputation, which he valued at upwards of £3000. The plaintiff gave evidence in corroboration of the above statement, afterwards the Court adjourned. The case was completed yesterday week, when it was arranged that a verdict should be taken for the plaintiff, subject to a reference, except on the plea of fraud, a verdict being entered for the defendant on that issue

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The operations in all Home Securities during the present week, both for Money and Time, have been much restricted. Prices, however, have been well supported, and in some instances they have shown a tendency to improve, owing to the small amount of gold withdrawn from the Bank of England for export purposes, the somewhat more favourable state of the foreign exchanges, and the resumption of bullion shipments from the United States. The improved position of the Bank, too, has had considerable influence upon speculators, who argue that there is no immediate prospect of money becoming dearer for discount purposes. There has, however, been a good, though not to say very active, demand for accommodation, and the late advance in the rates of discount has been well supported. In Lombard-street first-class short bills have been done at 4; three months', at 4¼ to 4½; four months', at 4½ to 4¾; and six months', at 5 to 5½ per cent. The leading bill-brokers are now taking in long-dated bills with more freedom. In the Stock Exchange loans have been granted for short periods at 1½ to 2 per cent.

A committee has been appointed in the Stock Exchange to consider upon what footing "time bargains" will stand under the proposed new Budget, since it is well known that those bargains have been declared illegal.

The dividend and bonus to be declared at the next meeting of the shareholders in the Ottoman Bank will be at the rate of 14 per cent per annum.

Both at St. Petersburg and Vienna the exchanges have taken another favourable turn, arising from the rumours afloat that Russia is about to contract another loan of £10,000,000. In the present state of our Money Market there is very little chance of a Russian loan finding any favour here.

The dealings in the new projects have rather increased:—St. Paulo Railway Shares have sold at ¼ to ⅛ dis.; Ocean Marine, 2 3-16 to 2 5-16 prem.; Universal, ⅝ ¾; and the New Bank of Turkey, ¼ ½ prem. and 1 discount. The wide difference in the value of the latter security has arisen from the want of a prompt delivery of the scrip, and of quantities suited to the convenience of many of the sellers.

A new company, entitled the London and Provincial Marine Insurance Company, has been issued. The capital is fixed at one million, in £20 shares.

The total imports of bullion have been under £100,000, but the whole have been taken for export purposes.

The dealings in English Stocks on Monday were only moderate. Bank Stock sold at 231. The Reduced and New Three per Cents sold at 94¾ ⅞; Consols, for Money, 94½ ⅝ ¼; Ditto, for Account, 94⅝ ½; Exchequer Bills, 23s. to 26s. prem. THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange, Feb. 13.—The supply of English wheat on offer here to-day was very moderate, but in improved condition. Dry samples changed hands steadily, at 1s. per quarter more money, and the value of other kinds was well supported. Foreign wheat—the show of which was tolerably good—commanded quite previous rates. There was a good consumptive inquiry for barley, at full quotations. Malt, however, was a dull inquiry. The oat trade was steady, at extreme rates; and, in some instances, beans advanced 1s. per quarter. Peas commanded full prices, and the value of flour was well supported.

Feb. 15.—The supplies of produce on offer this morning were very moderate. Generally speaking, the trade ruled steady, at fully Monday's currency.

English.—Wheat: Essex and Kent, red, 37s. to 46s.; ditto, white, 40s. to 52s.; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 37s. to 46s.; rye, 28s. to 31s.; grinding barley, 26s. to 28s.; distilling ditto, 28s to 30s.; malting ditto, 33s. to 46s.; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 60s. to 66s.; brown ditto, 48s. to 49s.; Kingston and Ware, 54s. to 66s.; Chevalier, 67s. to 71s.; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 21s. to 26s.; potato ditto, 26s. to 30s.; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s. to 25s.; ditto, white, 20s. to 27s.; tick beans, 33s. to 36s.; grey peas, 33s. to 35s.; maple, 37s. to 40s.; white, 36s. to 38s.; boilers, 38s. to 40s. per quarter. Cocoa.—More business is doing in this article, at full quotations.

Rice.—Importers, generally, are very firm; but no advance has taken place in prices.

Provisions.—We have to report only a limited inquiry for Irish butter, at about last week's currency. In the value of English and foreign parcels very little change has taken place. Bacon is dull, and rather cheaper. Most other provisions move off slowly, at late rates.

Oils.—Linseed oil is in moderate request, at 27s. 6d. to 27s. 9d. per cwt on the spot. All other oils move off freely, at full quotations. Spirits of turpentine, 36s. to 37s. per cwt.

NOTICE.—In consequence of Messrs. Lawes and Morton having just commenced 1860 with opposition claims to that which they previously affirmed, and wishing to do three gentlemen every justice, Mr. THORLEY is induced to RELEASE his remaining STOCK, making it to appear instead of 20 cows being bred from the first "Improved Cattle Food," that 30 cows have been fed, and consequently that the remainder have not been with the Food, and consequently that this complete failure must either be through mismanagement in the feeding, or the Food is not a true thing.
The last improver of Mr. Mechi declared the Food to be "a thing of nothing," and Mr. Mechi himself, after having used it for more than three months, declared it to be "a thing of nothing." Messrs. Lawes and Morton, in Joseph Thorley, the Inventor and sole proprietor of "Thorley's Food for Cattle," 77, Newgate-street, and 1, Bridge-road, New York, United States; Mr. J. W. Parkes, Rotherham, Victoria; Mr. Alfred Rust, Sydney, New South Wales; and Mr. Thomas Rust, Cape Town, United Kingdom.

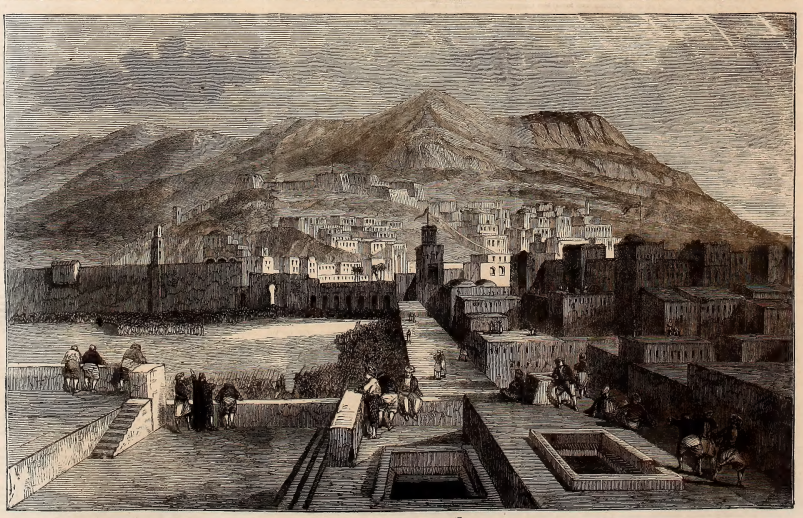
VIEW OF TETUAN FROM THE SOUTH.



TETUAN.

Now that the Spanish expedition to Morocco has achieved its first great success—the capture of Tetuan—a few particulars of that city and its neighbourhood may not be uninteresting to our readers. Christians, like Jews, find little favour in the eyes of good Musulmans, and the inhabitants of Tetuan claim to be amongst the most observant of Mohammed's doctrines; hence we have but sketchy descriptions of the town, roughed off in a very hasty manner, travellers not caring to expose themselves to the insults and attacks of a fanatic people.

The country round Tetuan is extremely varied, and in early spring nothing can be more fresh and beautiful than the vegetation that covers the plains and fringes the valleys in its neighbourhood. The showers that have recently fallen impart a delightful freshness to the earth. Young clover and other grasses carpet the ground; while numerous wild flowers, among others the white narcissus, diffuse a delicious fragrance through the atmosphere. Here and there the bank of the stream whose course one pursues is completely concealed by luxurious thickets of oleander, whose deep, green foliage and blossoms of bright pink offer the most beautiful contrast to the eye.

Supposing the traveller to be coming from the direction of Tangier, the first glimpse he catches of Tetuan is on issuing from a defile at no great distance from the city. A fine view is also obtained of the Atlas range, which constitutes the grand boundary of the desert towards the north. Clouds rest in dense masses upon its loftiest peaks, which are frequently capped with snow, and remind one strongly of the Bernese Alps. Some travellers think the scenery of Morocco inferior in grandeur to that of Spain—the mountains of Andalusia, and the warm, wild chain of Granada. Much depends upon association. One tourist says:—"I had wandered by Cintra, and it slated at the Tagus mouth; I had enjoyed the mingled softness and sublimity of the Lago di Garda, Como, and Lago Maggiore, in Northern Italy, and thought them all less impressive, less fraught with those qualities that stir the soul to its utmost depths, than the wild, cloud-capped, torrent-rent cones of Atlas, elevated, cold, and glittering with snow, amid all the glow and fervour of an African sun."

As we were saying, the first view of Tetuan, still some miles distant, is obtained on quitting a defile, its dazzling cluster of white buildings contrasting most strikingly with the deep blue of the Mediterranean in the background. The road by which we advance

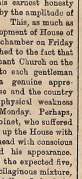
GREAT SQUARE OF TETUAN.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

AFTER all, in this country great constant financier is your greatest statesman. The man for the House of Commons is the Minister who, by his practical grasp of the material business of that House, so manages taxes as to put them in the least unacceptable form. Mr. Disraeli has never been really equal to a great Budget occasion; but Mr. Gladstone carries the House by storm, not only by force of his personal and political character, by earnest honesty of purpose, and his impressive eloquence, but by the amplitude of his knowledge of the specialty of his department. This, as much as the imperfect state of the occasion, made the Development House of Commons' piety which filled every place in the chamber on Friday last at prayers; of course, no weight being attached to the fact that this unanimous adhesion to a form of the dominant Church on the part of every section of religionists secures to each gentleman a seat for the whole evening. There was a genuine appreciation of the devotion to the wishes of the House and the courtesy exhibited by Mr. Gladstone in the matter of the Budget's weakness so far as to come down on Friday instead of Monday. Perhaps, too, he felt that something was due to the Cabinet, which suffered from every hour of delay. As it was, he walked up the House with an alacrity which was surprising, and bent his head with conscious pleasure before the hearty cheers which greeted his appearance. Excepting that he spoke for four hours instead of the expected five, and occasionally had recourse to sips of some advantageous mixture, there was no trace of weakness, physically or mentally. Indeed, he was more than usually playful, and at times humorous, with a freedom from that touch of grimness which usually accompanies his tendency into jocosity. Even gentlemen opposite were charmed into applause; although there was a palpable shudder among the country gentlemen when he had the audacity to talk of reducing the charge for game certificates, that seemed to touch them more nearly than the manipulation of the malt and hop duties,—a subject which is sectional rather than general among their class, who, to a man, are united on the sacred question of the Malt Tax.

It was certainly a great feat that four hours' talk, delivered in a voice which is sufficiently musical, sonorous, rounded, and perfectly modulated. There was an address adapted to the end in the purpose of awaking and keeping attention, piquing and teasing curiosity, and sustaining desire to hear from the first sentence to the last. It was such a speech—it was an oration in the best sense of the term—as the pages made eloquent, in which there was a proper restraint over the crowding of ideas, the words and the accuracy in the sentences, so that not a word chosen; the most perfect balancing of parts, and, more than all, there were no errors of omission, nothing was put wrongly, and nothing was overlooked. When it is considered that an enormous mental process was going on, accompanied by an enormous physical difficulty in the articulation of voice and keeping steady on the legs, and the most absolute self-possession, in a House crowded in every corner by eager listeners for every word, it must be allowed that the man who gets through such a work, and gets through it with triumph, must be a wonderful person, and blessed with an extraordinary faculty for the right application of his powers to attain. Yet Mr. Gladstone took it all quietly, in his way that is, as it would be said of Mr. Disraeli, with perfect gaiety. He was not "saying a few words" that evening. It is a prevalent belief that, if he had been in perfect health, and there had been no clock in the House, and he had had the whole night, and the whole day of the week, he could have talked right through the week, and on the Friday evening have taken a new subject for conversation with after these preliminary remarks I will proceed to deal with the subject matter of my financial statement."

Turning from the overshadowing event of the Parliamentary week, there are one or two matters which may be considered notable. In the first place, it is a remarkable fact that there is considerable significance in the aspect of the debate on the Church-rate Bill. It was probable that the opposition would have made the gathering of the Opposition and in the manner of the debate that would be to be generated by the stand which has been made, out of doors, on the question by the Church party. There was to be aggressive and active tactics of a serious Opposition movement. Large bodies of gentlemen opposed to the measure were in their places earlier in the session than was done—in putting up two of the promising young men of the party to take the initiative in the contest against the measure. Lord Robert Montagu and Mr. Walpole, the Under-Secretary for Parliamentary neophyte who has a capacity for cramming, and is not too deficient in the art of dispersing generally the contents of a plethora of blue-book and statistic. Then Mr. Robert Long is a young young man, and evidently of that sanguine, not to say irritable, temperament which accompanies the highest appreciation and capillary development which he enjoys. He was in his maiden effort—indeed, his only effort—in the House, on Thursday, looking very, and threw a number of sharp little pellets over at his antagonists, which stung and produced a wince. The occasion, however, seems likely to prove fatal to him, for he took on himself to second Mr. Spooner's motion for the abolition of the grant to Maynooth, and in doing so, as he thought, to put the matter once to say so, he descended into impudence, and he caught it accordingly. The general opinion was that Mr. Spooner's speech in a first oratorical effort in the House of Commons will be very satisfactorily put down. If an attempt is made to reduce small personality and indecorous license to a standard, Mr. Spooner's speech which stamped the character of the opposition movement on the occasion. It was a mere string of the most commonplace of church rates as a rallying cry to his party. Everything about it denoted the Low Church party, and the whole was put forth as a preliminary to the formal invitation to a meeting of Lord Derby's supporters which followed the exposition of the financial scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the country party is preparing to under these circumstances. It did not show a falling off in the attendance of the party rates, but a decided gathering of the supporters of that import with ulterior views.



Amongst the rocks ahead for the Government the Chinese question has been one of the most prominently set up, and there was much mixed up in the responsibilities of the affair of the Peho that Mr. Disraeli could not undertake to answer for. Lord John Russell's prominency to that subject in any programme of opposition to Lord Derby's Government, has he would not have intruded the initiation of the question to the wholly subordinate hands of Baillie Cochrane, or have allowed so inopportune a moment to have been chosen for it. Lord John's personal bias on the motion for going into Committee of Supply on the Navy Estimates, when every one knows the necessity of keeping the country ready for war, is a large increase to the demands for naval purposes. Certainly nothing could have contributed more to shutting the matter up than the speech of Lord John, which was the only real parliamentary story from 1856. A positive shudder ran through the House at the recital of the horrors of the bombardment, and the personal narrative gain that attention and interest which is usually accorded by the House to speeches in self-defence. The truth is that Sir Michael is a notable instance of the peculiarity which is not confined to gentlemen of his profession who, prompt, vigorous, and hearty on the quarter-deck, are not always conspicuous for their facilities in dealing with shoregoing matters. No doubt he was treated with the respect to which he is entitled, but he was certainly not very impressive. The result was that Lord John Russell had very little trouble in shelving the discussion and tumbling it into that Parliamentary limbo, "the proper occasion." Still less likely was Mr. W. Williams to get a hearing for his pottering generalities about expenditure, which always end in his showing that the muzzle of Mr. Hume has by no means descended upon him. Certainly, too, Mr. Horsman might have chosen a better opportunity for developing his theory about the exhaustion of coal in this country, and asking Ministers, who have had great difficulty in making things meet for one year, to look forward to the warmth and comfort of the hearths of this country for a century hence.

It was unquestionably a first-rate piece of tactics by which Lord Palmerston put a practical sailor, a naval reformer, and a very popular man, and faced with a frank, straightforward, pleasant manner, and a fund of good-humour, into the position of Secretary to the Admiralty, on whom the duty of moving the Estimates had devolved. There has hardly ever been a statement which exhibited more skill—we will not say cunning—under the mask of perfect openness and unqualified frankness, than that made by Lord Clarence Paget on this occasion. Sir Charles Wood's personal satisfaction; Mr. Williams seemed to forget the "bottle of the whole" in contemplating the invitation to the House to looking into the way in which the money was spent which was offered to him; while there was universal approval expressed at the determination that we have not only got a fleet, but that it is absolutely manned.

There are some questions that die of attenuation in the House of Commons. The abolition of the grant to Maynooth has become always suggestive of a "count out." Certainly, this time the appearance of Mr. Spooner, with a pair of huge pistols pointed, holding up a small tin chamber candlestick (probably his private property), from which issued a feeble flame, and which he used to assist him in reading a series of documents in the hope which grew in the House before the gas was turned on, gave the business the most ludicrous aspect. Any one used to the semi-darkness with his candlestick and his papers in either hand, it was so suggestive of the idea that he was nursing the Pope with "bell, book, and candle," that it was no wonder that sentences Tom Mr. Cardwell should declare that the sooner the scene was put an end to the better. After the abolition of Mr. Spooner's "dismal and dangerous" eloquence, what could stop a rush to a division when the hour was a quarter to seven? It is said that Sir Parr, after some experience of the locality, delivered his opinion that, from an intellectual point of view, Warwickshire produced Shakspeare and then became effete. May not this epic assertion be the solution of the representation of that fertile and beautiful county?

DR. THOMAS FORSTER.

Dr. Thomas Forster, M.D., F.R.S., who died at Brussels on the 2nd inst., was a man of considerable talent, and of extensive professional skill. Although educated for the medical profession he never practised, having inherited from his father a handsome and ample fortune, but devoted his time to literature. At Cambridge he was the constant companion of Byron and Shelley. As a linguist he had few equals, and was a profound and accomplished student upon astronomy and meteorology, subjects in which he took great interest. Dr. Forster was the author of a work which resulted in Belgium, during which time his house was the rendezvous of all the literary and scientific men visiting that kingdom from all parts of the world. He published his "Conversations on Light," in 1828, collected and published, with the assistance of Lord Kingand others, the works of his friend, Dr. Alderson, seventh Lord Stafford, by whom he had two sons and three daughters.

DR. FORSTER.

Lieutenant-General Sir W. F. P. Napier, K.C.B., one of a brotherhood of heroes, himself distinguished alike in arms and letters, died on Sunday at his residence, Scinde House, Clapham Park, aged seventy-four. He retired serving, in our next Number, a Portrait and memoir of the historian of the Peninsular War.

The total sum paid for the metropolitan police force in the year 1857 was £472,678; the total expenditure on account of it was £487,167.

The other morning, as an engine and fire-box were passing the Tewkesbury station of the Great Western Railway, the pressure of steam in the boiler was cut literally in two. It is supposed that in attempting to cross, the rails being exceedingly slippery from the frost, he fell.

Messrs. Godfrey Drake and Sons, of Huddersfield, merchants, received last week an inclosure of £70 from two ladies, sisters, who conduct a boarding-school at one of the watering-places on the Lancashire coast, to meet a loss sustained by the bankruptcy through misfortune of their deceased father, nearly twenty years ago.

Last Saturday morning a fire, which for the space of four or five hours raged with the greatest impetuosity, destroying in its progress property valued at several thousand pounds, broke out in the premises belonging to Mr. H. Roberts, haberdasher and manufacturer and exporter, situated at No. 12, Osborne-street, Whitechapel.

THE TREATY OF COMMERCE BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

WE publish in its entirety the Commercial Treaty between Queen Victoria and the Emperor Napoleon, signed at Paris January 23, 1860, and the ratifications of which were exchanged at Paris on the 4th inst. This treaty was laid before both Houses of Parliament yesterday week. Lord John Russell, at the same time that he laid the treaty before the House of Commons, placed on the table a correspondence respecting it which had passed between Lord Cowley and himself. The correspondence stated the basis of a treaty which Mr. Cobden had penned in consultation with Count Walewski, and which had been laid before the Emperor. Lord John Russell wrote a long letter of instructions on receipt of these proposals, and, before concluding his epistle, stated that the arrangements of the treaty would have to be adopted by Parliament.

TREATY OF COMMERCE BETWEEN HER MAJESTY AND THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH.

Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and his Majesty the Emperor of the French, being equally animated with the desire to draw closer the ties of friendship which unite their two peoples, and wishing to improve and extend the relations of commerce between their respective dominions, have resolved to conclude a treaty for that purpose, and have named as their Plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Most Honourable Henry Richard Charles Earl Cowley, Viscount Dangan, Baron Cowley, a Peer of the United Kingdom, a member of her Britannic Majesty's Privy Council, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, her Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Emperor of the French; and Richard Cobden, Esq., a member of the British Parliament;

His Majesty the Emperor of the French, M. Baroche, Grand Cross of the Imperial Order of the Legion of Honour, &c., a member of his Privy Council, President of his Council of State, provisionally charged with the Department of Foreign Affairs; and M. Rouher, Grand Officer of the Imperial Order of the Legion of Honour, &c., Senator, his Minister and Secretary of State for the Department of Agriculture, Commerce, and Public Works;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:—

Article 1.—His Majesty the Emperor of the French engages that on the following articles of British production and manufacture, imported from the United Kingdom into France, the duties shall in no case exceed thirty per cent ad valorem, the two additional decimes included. The articles are as follows:—Refined sugar; turmeric in powder; rock crystal worked; iron forged in lumps or prisms; brass wire (copper alloyed with zinc), polished or unpolished, of every description; chemical productions, enumerated or non-enumerated; extracts of dyewoods; garancine; common soap of every description, and perfumed soap; stoneware and earthenware, fine and common; china and porcelain ware; glass, crystal, mirrors, and plate-glass; cotton yarn; worsted and woollen yarn of every description; yarns of flax and hemp; yarns of hair, enumerated or non-enumerated; cotton manufactures; horsehair manufactures, enumerated or non-enumerated; worsted and woollen manufactures, enumerated or non-enumerated; cloth list; manufactures of hair; silk manufactures; manufactures of waste and floss silk; manufactures of bark and all other vegetable fibres, enumerated or non-enumerated; manufactures of flax and hemp; mixed manufactures of every description; hosiery; haberdashery and small wares; manufactures of caoutchouc and gutta percha, pure or mixed; articles of clothing, wholly or in part made up; prepared skins; articles of every sort manufactured from leather or skins, included or not under the denomination of small wares, fine or common; plated articles of every description; cutlery; metal wares, whether enumerated or not; pig and cast iron of every description, without distinction of weight; bar and wrought iron, with the exception of the kinds specified in article 17; steel; machinery, tools, and mechanical instruments of every description; carriages on springs, lined and painted; cabinet ware, carved work, and turnery of every description; worked ivory and wood; brandies and spirits, including those not distilled from wine, cherries, molasses, or rice; ships and boats; with respect to refined sugar and chemical productions of which salt is the basis, the excise or inland duties shall be added to the amount of the above specified duties.

Art. 2.—His Imperial Majesty engages to reduce the import duties in France on British coal and coke, to the amount of fifteen centimes for the hundred kilogrammes, with the addition of the two decimes. His Majesty the Emperor also engages, within four years from the date of the ratification of the present treaty, to establish upon the importation of coal and coke by land and by sea a uniform duty, which shall not exceed that which is fixed by the preceding paragraph.

Art. 3.—It is understood that the rates of duty mentioned in the preceding articles are independent of the differential duties in favour of French shipping, with which duties they shall not interfere.

Art. 4.—The duties ad valorem stipulated in the present treaty shall be calculated on the value at the place of production or fabrication of the object imported, with the addition of the cost of transport, insurance, and commission necessary for the importation into France as far as the port of discharge. For the levying of these duties the importer shall make a written declaration at the custom-house, stating the value and description of the goods imported. If the custom-house authorities shall be of opinion that the declared value is insufficient they shall be at liberty to take the goods on paying to the importer the price declared, with an addition of 5 per cent. This payment, together with the restitution of any duty which may have been levied upon such goods, shall be made within the fifteen days following the declaration.

Art. 5.—Her Britannic Majesty engages to recommend to Parliament to enable her to abolish the duties of importation on the following articles:—Sulphuric acid and other mineral acids; agates and cornelians, set; lucifers of every description; percussion caps; arms of every description; jewels, set; toys; corks; brocade of gold and silver; embroideries and needlework of every description; brass and bronzed manufactures, and bronzed metal; canes, walking canes or sticks, umbrella or parasol sticks, mounted, painted, or otherwise ornamented; hats, of whatever substance they may be made; gloves, stockings, socks, and other articles of cotton or linen, wholly or in part made up; leather manufactures; lace manufactured of cotton, wool, silk, or linen; manufactures of iron and steel; machinery and mechanical instruments, tools, and other instruments; cutlery, and other articles of steel, iron, or cast iron; fancy ornaments of steel and iron; articles covered with copper by galvanic process; millinery and artificial flowers; raw fruits; gloves and other leather articles of clothing; manufactures of caoutchouc and gutta percha; oils; musical instruments; worsted and woollen shawls, plain, printed, or patterned; coverlids, woollen gloves, and other worsted and woollen manufactures not enumerated; handkerchiefs, and other manufactures not enumerated, of linen and hemp; perfumery, cabinet ware, carved work, and turnery of every description; clocks, watches, and opera-glasses; manufactures of lead, enumerated or not enumerated; feathers, dressed or not; goats' and other hair manufactures; china and porcelain ware; stone and earthenware; grapes; sulphate of quinine; salts of morphine; manufactures of silk, or of silk mixed with any other materials, of whatever description they may be. Articles not enumerated in the tariff, now paying an ad valorem duty of ten per cent; subject, however, to such measures of precaution as the protection of the public revenue may require, against the introduction of materials liable to custom or excise duties, in the composition of articles admitted duty free in virtue of the present paragraph.

Art. 6.—Her Britannic Majesty engages also to propose to Parliament that the duties on the importation of French wine be at once reduced to a rate not exceeding 3s. a gallon, and that from the 1st of April, 1861, the duties on importation shall be regulated as follows:—1. On wine containing less than 15 degrees of proof spirit verified by Sykes's hydrometer, the duty shall not exceed one shilling a gallon. 2. On wine containing from 15 to 26 degrees, the duty shall not exceed one shilling and sixpence a gallon. 3. On wine containing from 26 to 40 degrees, the duty shall not exceed two shillings a gallon. 4. On wine in bottles, the duty shall not exceed two shillings a gallon. 5. Wine shall not be imported at any other ports than those which shall be named for that purpose before the present treaty shall come into force; her Britannic Majesty reserving to herself the right of substituting other ports for those which shall have been originally named, or of increasing the number of them. The duty fixed upon the importation of wine at ports other than those named shall be two shillings a gallon. 6. Her Britannic Majesty reserves to herself the power, notwithstanding the provisions of this article, to fix the maximum of proof spirit which may be contained in liquor declared as wine, without, however, the maximum being lower than 37 degrees.

Art. 7.—Her Britannic Majesty promises to recommend to Parliament to admit into the United Kingdom merchandise imported from France at a rate of duty equal to the excise duty which is or shall be imposed upon articles of the same description in the United Kingdom. At the same time the duty chargeable upon the importation of such merchandise may be augmented by such a sum as shall be an equivalent for the expenses which the system of excise may entail upon the British producer.

Art. 8.—In accordance with the preceding article her Britannic Majesty undertakes to recommend to Parliament the admission into the United Kingdom of brandies and spirits imported from France at a duty exactly equal to the excise duty levied upon home-made spirits, with the addition of a surtax of 2d. a gallon, which will make the actual duty payable on French brandies and spirits 8s. 2d. the gallon. Her Britannic Majesty also undertakes to recommend to Parliament the admission of rum and taffia imported from the French colonies at the same duty which is or shall be levied on these same articles imported from the British colonies. Her Britannic Majesty undertakes to recommend to Parliament the admission of paperhangings imported from France at a duty equal to the excise tax—that is to say, at 14s. per cwt.; and cardboard of the same origin at a duty which shall not exceed 15s. per cwt. Her Britannic Majesty further undertakes to recommend to Parliament the admission of gold and silver plate imported from France at a duty equal to the stamp or excise duty which is charged on British gold and silver plate.

Art. 9.—It is understood between the two high contracting Powers that if one of them thinks it necessary to establish an excise tax or inland duty upon any article of home production or manufacture which is comprised among the preceding enumerated articles, the foreign imported article of the same description may be immediately liable to an equivalent duty on importation. It is equally understood between the high contracting Powers that, in case the British Government should deem it necessary to increase the excise duties levied upon home-made spirits, the duties on the importation of wines may be modified in the following manner:—For every increase of 1s. per gallon of spirits on the excise duty there may be on wines which pay 1s. 6d. duty an augmentation not exceeding 1½d. per gallon; and on wines which pay 2s. an augmentation not exceeding 2½d. per gallon.

Art. 10.—The two high contracting parties reserve to themselves the power of levying upon all articles mentioned in the present treaty, or upon any other article, landing or shipping dues, in order to pay the expenses of all necessary establishments at the ports of importation and exportation. But in all that relates to local treatment the dues and charges in the ports, basins, docks, roadsteads, harbours, and rivers of the two countries, the privileges, favours, or advantages which are or shall be granted to national vessels generally, or to the goods imported or exported in them, shall be equally granted to the vessels of the other country, and to the goods imported or exported in them.

Art. 11.—The two high contracting Powers engage not to prohibit the exportation of coal, and to levy no duty upon such exportation.

Art. 12.—The subjects of one of the two high contracting Powers shall in the dominions of the other enjoy the same protection as native subjects in regard to the rights of property in trade marks and in patterns of every description.

Art. 13.—The ad valorem duties established within the limits fixed by the preceding articles shall be converted into specific duties by a supplementary convention, which shall be concluded before the 1st of July, 1860. The medium prices during the six months preceding the date of the present treaty shall be taken as the bases for this convention. Duties shall, however, be levied in conformity with the bases above established—1. In the event of this supplementary convention not having come into force before the expiration of the period fixed for the execution by France of the present treaty; 2. Upon those articles the specific duties on which shall not have been settled by common consent.

Art. 14.—The present treaty shall be binding for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland so soon as the necessary legislative sanction shall have been given by Parliament, with the reserve made in Article 6 respecting wines. Further, her Britannic Majesty reserves to herself the power of retaining, upon special grounds, and by way of exception, during a period not exceeding two years, dating from the 1st of April, 1860, half of the duties on those articles the free admission of which is stipulated by the present treaty. This reserve, however, does not apply to articles of silk manufacture.

Art. 15.—The engagements contracted by his Majesty the Emperor of the French shall be fulfilled, and the tariffs previously indicated as payable on British goods and manufactures shall be applied, within the following periods:—1. For coal and coke, from the 1st of July, 1860. 2. For bar and pig iron, and for steel of the kinds which are not subject to prohibition, from the 1st of October, 1860. 3. For worked metals, machines, tools, and mechanical instruments of all sorts, within a period which shall not exceed the 31st of December, 1860. 4. For yarns and manufactures in flax and hemp from the 1st of June, 1861. 5. And all other articles from the 1st of October, 1861.

Art. 16.—His Majesty the Emperor of the French engages that the ad valorem duties payable on the importation into France of merchandise of British production and manufacture shall not exceed a maximum of twenty-five per cent from the 1st of October, 1864.

Art. 17.—It is understood between the two high contracting Powers, as an element of the conversion of the ad valorem duties into specific duties, that for the kinds of bar iron which are at present subjected on importation into France to a duty of ten francs, not including the two additional decimes, the duty shall be seven francs on every hundred kilogrammes until the 1st of October, 1864, and six francs from that period, including in both cases the two additional decimes.

Art. 18.—The arrangements of the present treaty of commerce are applicable to Algeria, both for the exportation of her produce, and for the importation of British goods.

Art. 19.—Each of the two high contracting Powers engages to confer on the other any favour, privilege, or reduction in the tariff of duties of importation on the articles mentioned in the present treaty which the said Power may concede to any third Power. They further engage not to enforce one against the other any prohibition of importation or exportation which shall not at the same time be applicable to all other nations.

Art. 20.—The present treaty shall not be valid unless her Britannic Majesty shall be authorised by the assent of her Parliament to execute the engagements contracted by her in the articles of the present treaty.

Art. 21.—The present treaty shall remain in force for the space of ten years, to date from the day of the exchange of ratifications; and in case neither of the high contracting Powers shall have notified to the other, twelve months before the expiration of the said period of ten years, the intention to put an end to its operation, the treaty shall continue in force another year, and so on from year to year, until the expiration of a year, counting from the day on which one or other of the high contracting Powers shall have announced its intention to put an end to it. The high contracting Powers reserve to themselves the right to introduce by common consent into this treaty any modification which is not opposed to its spirit and principles, and the utility of which shall have been shown by experience.

Art. 22.—The present treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Paris within the period of fifteen days, or sooner if possible. In faith whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed it and affixed thereto the seal of their arms.

Done in duplicate at Paris, the 23rd day of January, in the year of our Lord 1860.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

THE LINNEAN SOCIETY has just published a new number of "Proceedings," in two parts, zoology and botany. Among the papers in the former part we would especially refer to Mr. Wallace's account of the zoological geography of the Malay Archipelago, which includes many thoughtful remarks on the distribution of animals over the surface of the globe, and on the origin of species, now the subject of so much attention. The most remarkable paper in the botanical part is by Mr. Richard Spruce, entitled "Notes of a Visit to the Cinchona Forests on the Western Slopes of the Quitenean Andes," full of interest even to the general reader, much more to the botanist.

THE GEOLOGICAL SOCIETY has this month published two parts of their journal, a supplement to last year's journal, and the first number for the new year. The more remarkable papers in the former are those by Professor Ansted on the Geology of Malaga; by Dr. J. W. Dawson on the Vegetable Structure in Coal (with plates): and by Professor Huxley on some Amphibian Remains from Africa and Australia, and on a Fossil Bird and Cetacean from New Zealand (with plates). In the new part for the year we would especially refer to Professor Owen's description of some reptilian remains from South Africa (with plates).

THENARD.—The eulogium upon this illustrious French chemist has been recently given before the French Academy of Sciences by M. Flourens. It is partially given in the feuilleton of l'Institut, and should be read by all young chemists. Thénard, at twenty years of age, a poor lad, in 1797, applied to the great Vauquelin, who, himself poor, kindly received him as his assistant, and superintended his studies. Three years after Thénard commenced his brilliant course of discoveries, by obtaining glucinum from a piece of beryl; and soon attained a high position in the scientific world. The discourse is enlivened with anecdotes of the great chemist's contemporaries.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL delivered his fifth lecture on "Light and Colours" on Thursday last week, the principal subjects being irradiation and achromatism. When we regard any object highly illuminated the image upon the retina spreads a little beyond its proper limits, and the object appears larger than it really is. This is irradiation. The fact was demonstrated by many experiments—viz., white discs, &c., illuminated by the electric light, appeared perceptibly larger than dark ones of precisely the same size; the platinum wire between the poles of a voltaic battery, when red hot, seemed larger than when cold. Irradiation also causes the new moon to appear in the old moon's arms. Newton supposed that refraction could not occur without dispersion of the rays of light, thus giving rise to colours (as seen in large lenses). Dollond proved the contrary. Water with the same amount of refraction as flint glass causes much less dispersion, and with the same amount of dispersion causes much greater refraction. By neutralising the dispersion Dollond destroyed the colour, and eventually succeeded in making achromatic (or colourless) lenses. Dr. Tyndall concluded his lecture by stating that the sensitiveness of the eye to any colour is blunted by exposure to that colour; and that when the eye, thus affected, receives white light, that colour for which its sensitiveness is diminished will be partially withdrawn, and the residual complementary colour will be seen—(green after red, &c.) This was experimentally shown in a convincing manner.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY gave the Friday evening discourse on the subject so much occupying scientific minds at the present time—"Species and Races; and their Origin." He limited himself to the consideration of three principal points—viz., What are species, and what problems are involved in the consideration of their origin? what, on the known principles of scientific logic, are the necessary conditions of any solution of these problems? and, lastly, how far does any solution, and, in particular, that set forth by Mr. Darwin, in his remarkable work on the Origin of Species, satisfy these conditions? As an example of a species Professor Huxley selected the horse, pointing out that it is distinguished from all others by certain peculiarities in structure and form, and by others which are physiological—the latter comprising more particularly the phenomena of hybridism. But, besides these distinctive and peculiar features, the horse has relations, more or less remote, not only with every living animal but with animals long extinct. The geographical distribution of the horse and its allied species is exceedingly remarkable; and, lastly, the amount of variation which has been produced by natural or by artificial means within the range of the species equus is exceedingly remarkable. All species of animals and plants exhibit similarly complex relations; and, as man is one of these species, the general doctrine of their origin involves discussions of great interest. The scientific form of the origin of species is simple enough. It is—Given a substance, to find why that substance assumes the form and exhibits the relation of other substances which it is observed to have in nature. In the case in question, the system is living matter, and the point is to determine experimentally how that matter assumes the form and character of living species, and how far the causes artificially operative of this result are active in nature. Taking the breeds of pigeons as the result of a long series of experiments upon the artificial production of species, and admitting that the selection exercised by the fancier might readily come about by natural causes, and chiefly as the result of the struggle for existence on which Mr. Darwin has well insisted, the lecturer pointed out that the evidence in favour of the origin of species by such selection is not quite complete, inasmuch as the pouter, carrier, &c., although they exhibit the full morphological differences of species, do not present the physiological character of well-marked species. That this difference in the evidence would be made up by future investigation seems exceedingly probable; but in the meantime it is desirable to consider Mr. Darwin's views as embodying an exceedingly valuable hypothesis, the following out of which will assuredly lead us to very great and comprehensive generalisations. In conclusion, the professor warned his hearers against allowing other than scientific arguments to have weight in dealing with such questions as these, and urged upon their attention the close connection of the greatness of England with the advance of thoroughly scientific modes of thought among all classes of its population. The chair was occupied by Sir Henry Holland, Bart., and the audience included many of the most eminent philosophers of the country. In the library were exhibited living specimens of various kinds of pigeons—the wild rock, pouter, tumbler, carrier, fantail, and trumpeter.

DR. LANKESTER delivered his third lecture on Animal Substances and on the Arts on Saturday last, the subject being the useful products of the class Mollusca. After alluding to the families Polyzoa and Tunicata, he proceeded to examine the structure of the shells of the bivalve and univalve groups of these animals. The main uses of shells depend on the production of the inner layer of the shell, called the nacreous layer. The nature of this layer was described, and the production of its beautiful iridescent colours, by the law of the interference of light, was explained. The nature and history of pearls was then entered upon, and pearls and pearl ornaments were exhibited. Illustrations of the process of cameo-making were also given, and a variety of applications of shells to useful purposes in the arts alluded to. The lecture was illustrated by a beautiful collection of cameos from Mr. Phillips in Cockspur-street, a variety of mother-of-pearl manufactures from Mr. Luard in Fleet-street, a beautiful collection of ornamental shells from Mr. Samuel, of East Smithfield, and two curiously-carved pearl shells from China from Mr. Hewitt, of Fenchurch-street.

PROFESSOR OWEN on Tuesday last resumed his lectures on "Fossil Reptiles," his subject being the great extinct predatory sea-lizard, the ichthyosaurus, so well known by Mr. Waterhouse's restoration at Sydenham, and of which thirty species are known to the lecturer. This animal was remarkable for the shortness of its neck, the equality of the width of its head with the front of its chest, and the enormous magnitude of its eye, which probably enabled it to descry its prey in the water at short or long distances in the obscurity of night. The cornea, fully exposed to the buffeting of the waves, was defended by no less than seventeen hard (sclerotic) plates. Its fins were adapted for crawling on the sand whenever it desired to bask in the sunshine; and between the ribs of many specimens masses of fishbones and other food have been found in various stages of digestion. Professor Owen dwelt upon the anatomical structure, and especially referred to the researches of Sir Philip G. Egerton in respect to this animal.

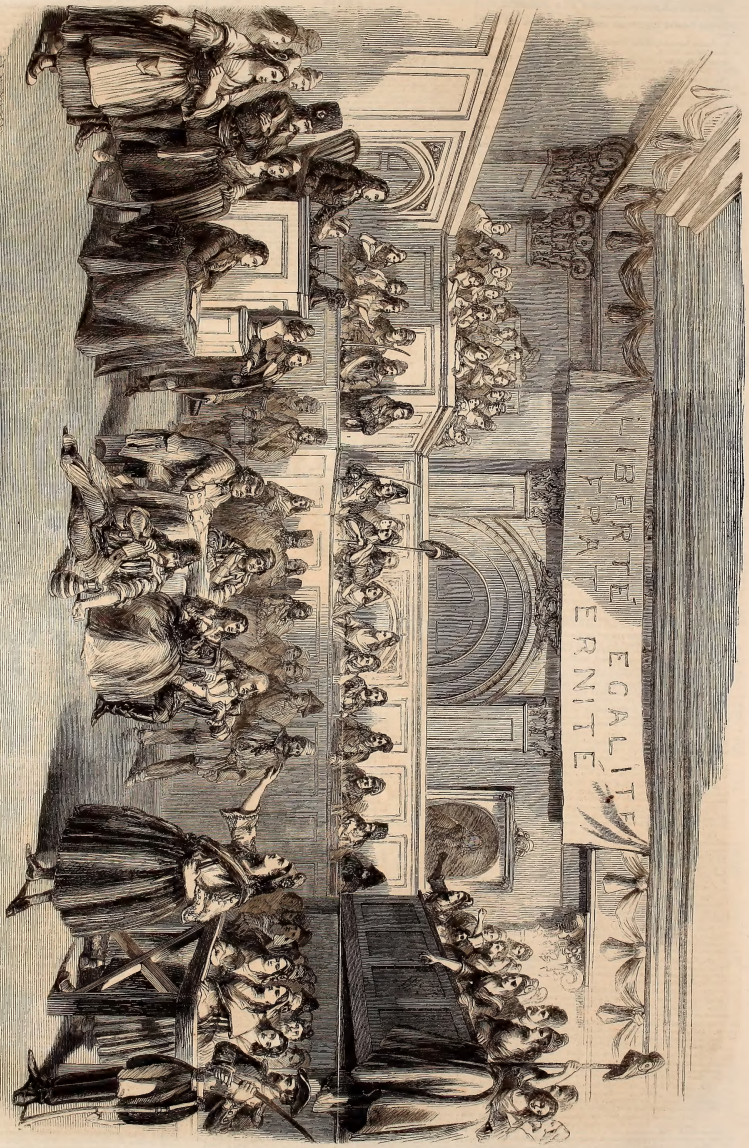
The nineteenth annual ploughing match, trial of ploughs, draining, digging, and fencing, connected with the Wirral Farmers' Club, took place on Wednesday week, on the farm of Mr. John Walker, of Stourton. The character of the ploughing indicated great improvement in the district, and the judges had considerable difficulty in deciding upon the successful competitors. The usual club dinner took place in the evening.

THE WOUNDED LUCKNOW SOLDIER.—A letter appeared in the Times a few days ago describing the sufferings of a wounded soldier, returning to his native place, Amesbury, under care of an old woman. The Incumbent of that place, Mr. Fowle, writes as follows:—"That touching letter has brought to me ninety-three communications from so many benevolent individuals, most of them containing post-office orders, gold, or postage-stamps, and others inquiring into facts with a view, if found to have been correctly stated, of aiding in the same generous cause. I have at this moment time and opportunity only to say that the afflicted soldier's name is John George Mills, corporal of the 32nd Regiment; that he is lying now in a poor cottage in Amesbury, too evidently in a dying state, under the care of the aged female relative who accompanied him from Plymouth; that I have written to his commanding officer, and that I am making the necessary inquiries to enable me rightly to discharge the responsibility imposed upon me."

GUNNERY PRACTICE AT HYTHE.

FOR those who love gunnery in all its branches there is nothing more pleasant than a trip to Hythe, albeit a more desolate seaside place can scarcely be seen. The town nestles snugly enough under a long range of hills, at one end of which the Shorncliffe Camp is just discernible, clinging on to the side of a cliff; but the beach has a most bankrupt, dreary air, with a set of baths, shut up, one row of lodging-houses, and a large, half-finished shell of another. It bristles at intervals, as far as the eye can reach, with martello towers, where the volunteers are exercised, and from which danger-flags are waved to the mariners when the practice commences on the butts. This musketry-ground is a long, deep shingle, fearfully trying to walkers who are not quite up to the mark, and about half a mile broad. It is sadly windy, and, as they are obliged to shoot towards the sea, there is no suitable background for the eye; but still many first-rate shots are trained there. The eighteen-feet target of General Hay, the Commandant, is a very prominent object, and on each side of it are ranged the targets for the men, with little cast-iron huts, from which the effect of the shots is telegraphed by means of different flags held in different positions.

The School of Musketry was formed about five years since, under the auspices of Lord Hardinge, who felt how much this arm of the service had been neglected; and Colonel Wilford and Captains O'Callaghan and Fairtlough are the instructors. There are four courses during the year, of eleven weeks each, for the Army. One officer and two picked sergeants come from each regiment in the service, along with adjutants of militia, &c., and there are few men who have to undergo so severe a probation as these officers to win a first-class certificate. School-days, fagging included, are almost child's-play by the side of it. About fifty officers come up at one time, which is as much as the town can accommodate; and we believe it is the intention of the Government, when the above regiments are gone through, to extend the benefits of the system to the Irish police and the pensioners. The volunteers come by parties of fifty, according as their names are down at the Horse Guards, for twelve days; but they are merely worked in drill, firing, distance-judging, &c., and attend two or three lectures. Four sets of them are thus got through in the course of the year, and the unhappy instructors have no holiday at all. The game shots carry everything before them at the short distances, but all distinction is leveled after that, and the best men generally prove to be those who have never pulled a trigger before, and are not too opinionated to learn. If the thing is worth doing at all it is worth doing well, and it would be very advisable if those volunteers who really desire to form a crack corps would engage an instructor for themselves who had got his first-class certificate, and go more into the real science of rifle-shooting, instead of depending on a captain who has merely gone through his allotted twelve days, and left nearly as wise as he came as regards the real science of the thing.



For years certain artillery corps have existed, but the expense of entering and equipment has been very great, and the artillery part of their duty was so small in comparison with the rest of the drill that they hardly deserved the name of artillery companies. The City Artillery Company has long been in existence, but the rifle has now taken up more of the attention of this guard than the cannon, more especially as it is easier for them to find a place of practice within a reasonable distance from town.

The martello towers at Hythe are about a quarter of a mile apart, and there are also three forts—Fort Moncrieff, to the extreme west of Hythe; Fort Sutherland, near the School of Musketry, and on the practice-ground; and Fort Twiss, to the east of the town.

Our Illustration is taken on the top of one of these towers, and shows part of the drill where the men are being taught to load. The chief instructor is seen giving directions to the volunteers as to the position of their hands; another volunteer is ready with the ball; while a third is listening attentively to another instructor, who is explaining how and why the nipple-hole should be covered with the thumb while loading.

8. Q to Q 2nd

(It was tempting to take the Bishop, and thus double White's Pawns; but, on looking well into the position, it does not appear that Black would have gained much advantage by that line of play.)

8.	B takes B
9. Q takes B	Kt to K 2nd
10. P to Q 4th

(Well played.)

10.	Kt to K Kt 3rd
11. Castles on Q's side	Q to K 2nd
12. P to K Kt 3rd	B to K 3rd
13. P to Q 5th	B to Q 2nd
14. K Kt to Q 2nd	P to Q R 3rd
15. P to K B 4th	P to Q Kt 4th
16. B to Q 3rd

(This move costs Black a valuable Pawn.)

BLACK (Mr. C.)	(WHITE Mr. W.)
16.	P to Q Kt 5th
17. Kt to K 2nd	P takes K B P
18. P takes P	K Kt takes Q P

(A serious loss, but that Black, by the opening for his Rook on the King's side, is enabled to organise a vigorous attack upon the adverse King immediately.)

19. Q to K Kt 3rd	K Kt to Q Kt 3rd
20. Kt to K B 3rd	K R to Q B sq
21. K R to K Kt sq

(Threatening to win the Kt by P to K B 5th.)

21.	Q to K B sq
22. P to K B 5th	Kt to K 4th
23. Kt takes Kt	P takes Kt
24. Q takes K P	P to K B 3rd

27. Kt to K Kt 6th	B takes Kt
28. Q takes B	K to K R sq
29. P to K 5th

(This is the correct play, and after the advance of this Pawn White's game is indefensible.)

29.	Kt to Q 2nd
30. Q R to K sq	P takes P
31. P to K B 6th	Kt takes P
32. Q R to K B sq

(Again well played.)

32.	Q to K Kt sq
33. R takes Kt	K R to K B sq

And White resigned the game and match, the final score being—

5. P to Q B 3rd	B to Q R 4th
6. P to Q 4th	P takes P
7. Castles	Kt to K B 3rd

(This, it will be remembered, was the defence adopted successfully by Anderssen in his first game with Morphy.)

8. B to Q R 3rd

(Perhaps the best reply to the second player's last move. See the "Addenda and Corrigenda" in "Chess Praxis," p. 621.)

8.	P to Q 3rd
9. P to K 5th

(Up to this point the moves are identical with a game between Mr. Morphy and Mr. Deacon printed in our Journal of Dec. 17; and, indeed, M. de Rivière writes to us expressing an opinion that this identity in the opening has led Mr. Deacon into the error of confounding the games. Mr. de Rivière believes that the "Evans' Gambit" in question, published on December 17, was really played betwixt him and Mr. Deacon, while the present game was that won by Mr. Morphy.)

9.	P to Q 4th

(Here, in the game referred to, the second player moved his K Kt to Kt 5th.)

10. B to Q Kt 5th	Kt to K 5th
11. P takes P	B to Q 2nd
12. Q to Q R 4th	B to Q Kt 3rd

And Black surrendered.

"THE TALE OF TWO CITIES."

WE give this week a highly characteristic Illustration from the drama now performing at the Lyceum Theatre, in which Madame Celeste, assisted by Tom Taylor, has, with laudable attention to the scenic accessories, done so much to realise the terrors of the French Revolution in the year 1793, and to set the story of Mr. Charles Dickens, histrionically considered, in the most effective light. All this is concentrated in the scene produced by our artist—that of the Tribunal in the second act. Here, at one glance, may be witnessed the mode of popular trial, where passion and prejudice clothe themselves with the attributes of patriotism and justice, and revenge secures the victim which the law must have allowed to escape. Madame Defarge appeals to vengeance for a long unsatisfied wrong, and receives it from an excited multitude that cares little for the forms of evidence, or the distinction of person, so that the guilt is punished in some one, however remotely connected with it. In this case the sin of the parent is visited on the offspring; and thus the craving for retribution in the awakened hearts of the populace is satisfied. The taste of blood thus experienced, new appetites are created, whose raging can only be appeased at a festival of death. The dreadful feeling which we have thus indicated is fully communicated by the details of this scene, which in all respects is in accordance with the facts of history, and breathes the very spirit of that awful time.

In these days, when most dramas on the English stage are adapted from foreign sources, it is gratifying to witness a production which is indebted for its origin to English genius. The French Revolution, moreover, seems destined to supply the materials for future dramatic productivity, and will, ere long, command a specific dramatic treatment with especial reference to the stage, and an immediate fitness in regard to it. The present time is, in many respects, of a transitive character, and in none more so than in its theatrical relations. There is, however, an evident law of development, from which the happiest issues are to be hoped.

Of the original portion (25,000,000 florins) of the Russian Dutch Loan guaranteed by Great Britain in 1835, a balance of principal remains due of 14,000,000 florins. The amount paid last year out of the Consolidated Fund for interest and sinking fund was £82,440.

BREACH OF PROMISE.—£1200 DAMAGES.—In the Court of Queen's Bench, last Saturday, Mrs. Hart, a Jewish widow, of about forty years of age, brought an action against Mr. W. S. Page, a widower, of about forty-five, for breach of promise of marriage. The plaintiff had nine children, and the defendant five. About twelve months after Mr. Hart's death the defendant, who is a solicitor, induced Mrs. Hart to make all preparations for the marriage in regular form; but, having done so, without any pretence, after an interval of dogged silence, and after causing her the greatest possible injury in society, he broke off his engagement. Several of the defendant's letters to plaintiff were read, but they were of a remarkably prosaic character. In a letter dated May 12, 1859, he told her not to be apprehensive as to results, for that he would not place her in a false position. He thought it right, however, to show their friends that he acted without precipitation. The next letter was dated May 13, and was from Lavender Lodge, Olney, Bucks. It commenced "Dearest Elizabeth." It declared, "should our union take place, so far as I am concerned, we shall not have cause to regret it." The letter then alluded to the family annoyances which had been caused by their engagement, and expressed a desire that the writer had the power to remove them. This referred to the circumstance that Mrs. Hart's children, on ascertaining their mother's engagement, and of her intended change of religion, had quarreled with her. They afterwards left their mother. In the following month, in accordance with Mr. Page's suggestion, Mrs. Hart determined to become a member of the Church of England, and accordingly, in November, 1859, she was baptized at St. Pancras Church. The marriage was to have taken place about Christmas; but long before that Mr. Page had broken off all communication with Mrs. Hart. He left her house, after spending the evening there, on the 9th of September, and she had not seen him since. Things had gone so far that a deed of settlement had been drawn up, in which Mr. Page was a participator, settling £70 each on Mrs. Hart's two daughters and £30 on her youngest son. This provision Mrs. Hart thought it right to make out of her small means for her children in the event of the marriage taking place. Moreover, furniture had been transferred from her house to his, and directions had been given in concert with Mr. Page for letting her house in Tavistock-square. Wedding cards had likewise been prepared, Mr. Page ultimately paying for his, Mrs. Hart for hers. Several witnesses having been called on behalf of the plaintiff, Mr. Huddleston addressed the jury in mitigation of damages, as he could not deny the promise to marry. It was idle to pretend that the plaintiff had quarreled with her family on account of her becoming a Christian at Mr. Page's suggestion. It was beyond all question that for many years she had been a Christian at heart; and even the attorney's letter threatening this action was written before she was baptized.—The jury found for the plaintiff—damages £1200.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE POULTRY SHOW.

THE winter exhibition of poultry and pigeons at the Crystal Palace, just closed, was decidedly the best that Mr. Houghton, the untiring secretary of this department, has had the pleasure of placing before the public—the number being greater, and the quality and condition of the birds more than usually good. The advance in the particular breeds of Dorking and game poultry was particularly marked. Indeed, the first-named class stole a quick march on the Cochin China importation, which, being so easily acclimatised in this country, appears to have stimulated our home breeders to increased exertion. The symmetry of that always symmetrical breed of game birds seemed at the same time to have increased in an equal ratio to the development of ugliness in the Cochin Chinas. The black game birds, a somewhat rare variety, made a good show. The well-known pugnacity of the game birds, hens as well as cocks, was exhibited in a remarkable way. The pens being in an even line, the heads of the birds were constantly thrust sideways through the bars at each extremity, and some very exciting fights were thus maintained, the woodwork being stained with the blood of the combatants. In many cases it was found necessary to nail strips of wood over the apertures, and so prevent a breach of the peace likely to spoil the owner's chance of gaining a prize. Branching off from the long lines of poultry into the quadrangle appropriated to turkeys, geese, and ducks, the impression of greatly-increasing size was at once heightened by a glance at the specimens. The turkeys, fortunate survivors of the insatiably festive season—vain, irritable, fussy, aldermanic, sausagerial—were larger than one could have believed it possible for turkeys to become under the most favourable conditions. To think of such monsters being, as they all are, young, tender, and succulent, was most provoking. Consolation of any useful sort could only be found in the department of Mr. Strange, at the further extremity of the Palace, where the bodies of these and other delicate creatures are exhibited in a far more attractive and convenient form. The geese, conscious descendants (as appeared by their solemn gaze and occasional objurations when a spectator happened to pause before them) of those sacred but silly fowls whose cackling saved the Capitol, and which have always been noted for a complacent fatuity, were even more remarkable for bigness than the turkeys. The ducks, especially the white Aylesbury kind, were wonderfully good. The different classes of pigeons combined several fine specimens of the pouter, carrier, almond-tumbler, fantails, and barbs, the separate and marked individuality of which was as great as in the case of the poultry, ranging through all varieties of Cochin China, Bantam, Poland, Brahma Pootra, and the many pure English breeds. The pens were ranged in the lower space at the west end of the building. It may not be amiss to state, as a proof of the high value which continues to be attached to beauty of plumage, symmetry, and extraordinary size, that several pens were claimed at what the owners thought to be prohibitory prices.

CREDITON GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

THE Grammar School of Crediton was founded by Edward VI., who incorporated and endowed twelve of the inhabitants for the better preservation of the goods and hereditaments of the parish church of Crediton, and the "better instruction of boys." Queen Elizabeth more richly endowed the "twelve governors of the church of Crediton" and their successors for ever out of the tithes which lately belonged to the College of Crediton, but which had been seized by her rapacious father, and ordered that the free Grammar School, founded by her brother, should be called after her name.

The income of the present "twelve governors" (three of whom are members of Parliament) is about £4000 per annum, arising from the tithes of the large parishes of Crediton, Sandford, and Exminster,

SPECTACLES.—Optical Improvements, to enable persons at an advanced age to read with ease, and to distinguish objects with perfect distinctness.—Messrs. out of which the masters of the Grammar School are paid, as well as the Vicar of Crediton and several other clergymen. The governors also pay the organist and keep the church in repair, adjoining which, in what was anciently called the "Ladye" Chapel, was the old Grammar School.

The present building is a noble and imposing brick structure, faced with Bath stone, and it is sixty-three feet long and twenty-five broad, with a proportionate height, and on one side of it is the Head Master's house, and on the other that appropriated for the Second Master, the two houses having every accommodation for about fifty boarders. These fine buildings are situated in a very healthy and pleasant part of Crediton. The masters of the school are the Revs. J. Mansey and J. Capper, and Mr. Alfred Edwards is the English teacher.

Several exhibitions of £60 are attached to the Crediton Grammar School, and many of the boys, called "choristers," receive ten pounds per annum each.

The architect who prepared the designs for this magnificent building, which is in the Elizabethan style, is Mr. Hayward, of Exeter; and they were carried out under the supervision of his assistant, Mr. Dudley. The contractors were the Messrs. Thomas, of Crediton.

The inauguration of the "Hayward Charity Schools," the trustees of which are endowed with £20,000 to carry out the objects of their trust, also took place on the 9th instant, Mr. J. W. Buller, M.P., a trustee of both schools, being the principal speaker.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1018.—VOL. XXXVI.] SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1860. [TWO NUMBERS AND COLOURED SUPPLEMENT] TENPENCE

THE BUDGET IN PARLIAMENT.

Who can estimate the difficulties and the troubles of a leader of Opposition who heads a party without a plan or a policy? In such a situation he finds it necessary not to be silent or inactive, and the more when there is a positive delusion existent among his followers that they are actually the strongest section in the House of Commons. But it appears as if Mr. Disraeli has had to face another difficulty, and that from within. In those days of 1853 when there was a Coalition Government, with an Opposition consisting of one man only, and that man himself, it would seem that he got on much better. Since that time some of the nonentities who suddenly awakened one morning and found themselves Cabinet Ministers, and, by consequence, Statesmen, have grown into a factitious importance; while, in the second grades in the ranks of his followers, the commander of the Conservative forces in the Lower House has probably, with jealousy and alarm, beheld the gradual evolvement of a desire to distinguish themselves on the part of some gentlemen whom he would gladly keep in the condition of proximate, rather than actual, rising young men. Something of this state of things, we imagine, is to be traced in the singular course which was taken by the Opposition on the initiation of the debates on the Budget. As the matter first stood everything was regular and in order for the usual display of Parliamentary tactics. One of the growing hopes of the Conservative party was intrusted with the duty of moving an amendment on going into Committee on the financial plan of the Government, who would, of course, have been succeeded on the first night by the usual second-rate member of the Government; and for four nights the discussion would have gone on in the ordinary fashion, culminating on the last in an oratorical duel between the Leader of the Opposition and the Chancellor of the Exchequer—an exhibition which would have gained no little of its excitement, akin to that which hounded on the gladiators of old, by the circumstance that it would have taken place at some impossible hour of the morning.

But for once, or at least for the special occasion, the expectation was destined to be disappointed. In the quietest and least obtrusive way Mr. Disraeli placed a notice of amendment on the paper which, of necessity, interposed between the formal and broad issue which was about to be joined, and, putting himself in the van, he led an attack which, feeble in its conception, was equally feeble in its execution; which, if it was intended as a feint, was, by bad management, and probably by lukewarmness if not disaffection, in the ranks of his party, suffered to be turned into a real movement, and therefore resulted in a discomfiture so signal, in every sense and from every point of view, that its practical result can be little less than annihilation of anything like organised and systematic attempts to check or control the career of the Government in their dealing with the progress of their financial scheme. If it were really of any consequence, if it mattered after what has occurred a straw what line the Opposition took, it might be desirable, if not profitable, to inquire whence and for what reason did this change come over the spirit of that dream in the foreground of which floated a Government defeated, but in the deep shadows of which lurked a trade and commerce paralysed, great principles overthrown, an alliance promising peace and prosperity shattered to its base, and the country distracted by the paltry struggles of parties when it was demanding the settlement of vast questions and tranquillity for the performance of its duties and its business.

It is not very wonderful that, after the whole country, with the exception of a few class interests, the representatives of which are nibbling at details, has accepted the Budget, the House of Commons should find itself in such a position as to feel bound to recognise and adopt it also. It would not be very surprising if even the great beer interest—from the producer of hops, the dealer in malt, and the potential brewing monopoly, down to the miserable publican, struggling in the bondage of his inevitable mortgagee, who perforce supplies him with the article in which he deals, and which he is obliged to adulterate up to the point of poisoning his customers in order that he may live himself—was to discover that the reduction of the wine duty is not a strong-drink question, but part of a system of interchange of staple productions between France and this country. In passing, it may be hinted, as regards the importation of wine, that it is probably only a question of supply whether the reduction of the duties may not actually result in gain to the revenue, owing to increased consumption. It is not without interest to observe how, in addition to the broad and downright effect of the general decision by the public in favour of the financial scheme, the sectional influences from without have worked on opinions and votes in the House of Commons. Noting here and there the course taken by different individual members, one understands how it is that the feeling in favour of the Budget is so widespread, and how it appeals to and reconciles so many contending views and interests.

It is to be remembered that the reduction of duties in France includes an immense variety of our products and manufactures; and, as the old song says, "many small articles make up a sum." It is quite intelligible, for instance, why Alderman Copeland should for the nonce leave the ranks of the Conservative party and follow Mr. Gladstone into the lobby, for he represents the great crockery interest in this country, a large trade in which with France is likely to ensue, for it goes direct to an immense middle-class want in that country; and Mr. Disraeli will probably forgive the temporary defection of his follower on this account when he remembers how eloquently in one of his novels he deplores that the completeness of a French dinner should be neutralised by the absence of hot plates. It is probable that Mr. Roebuck will be moved to give more than a silent assent to the Budget when he is reminded by his constituents in Sheffield that they, too, will be called upon to supply another middle-class want in France, in the shape of cutlery that will cut, at a moderate price. It would not be very astonishing, too, if ere long in France in ordinary houses there will be discovered locks that will secure doors, and keys sufficiently portable to be carried conveniently in the pocket. The inhabitants of the county of Durham have contrived to impress their representative, Mr. Liddell, with the justice and wisdom of an international arrangement which will give additional stimulus to the dealings in their great staple product of coal, with regard to which they are of opinion that it will be in their power to supply any demand from abroad, in addition to those of their customers at home, without any chance of their exhausting our national carbonaceous vein in three hundred years, and without unduly strengthening the militant power of France, in reference to an article which for that purpose she will and must obtain somewhere, whether we like it or no.

It is from the contemplation and the comprehension of details like these that the reason is led up to the thorough understanding of the great principle which runs through the whole of Mr. Gladstone's fiscal arrangements. If the heavy impost of an income tax at its present percentage be considered from the right point of view it will be seen how that also contributes towards the ultimate end which is designed. That object is the preservation of peace and tranquillity in Europe and the world. It is a question of time only whether the policy which has just been inaugurated does not result in placing the relations between England and France on the same footing as they stand between England and America. Jealousies and touchinesses, if not arising from exactly the same causes, exist equally between England and France, and England and America; and it is not too much to say that often on both sides, in each instance, there is a latent desire to come to blows. How many times within the last twenty years has war between this country and the United States been pronounced to be more than imminent; and who shall say that the passage of a single mail-steamer between Liverpool and New York has not brought an influence to bear which has tended to arrest the very inception of an insane and mutually suicidal struggle? What is to prevent a similar state of things arising out of the interweaving of national interests, and the consequent better personal knowledge of the citizens of France and England each by the other? It is not yesterday that the prophetic eye of statesmen have beheld the yielding of military power before the advancing force of trade and commerce; but within the last quarter of a century it has become an acknowledged fact that the time is approaching when the rule of the sword must yield to the potent reign of peace which must follow the universal intercourse of nations. It is no small step in this direction when the Sovereign of the first military power of the world has given in his adhesion to the principle and the practice which must end in the ultimate melting away of his armed legions. Is it too much to anticipate that the time is not too far distant when a new state of things in Europe will enable this country to reduce her vast expenditure; and is not that the real way to look at the prospect of minimising or abolishing the income tax? That tax, as at present imposed, is simply the investment of so much capital by this nation for the carrying out of a great scheme of regeneration in the world—a scheme for binding all mankind—and us and our nearest neighbours in particular—by one vast chain of mutual interests and common objects which neither the ambition of Sovereigns, the blundering of diplomacy, the thirst for military glory, nor the incapacity and blindness of statesmen, will be able to shake, far less to burst asunder, for their day of influence for good or for evil will have been superseded by the dawn of that practical millennium which will be comprehended in the brotherhood of all the peoples of the earth.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR AND THE POPE.

A despatch addressed by M. Thouvenel to the Duke de Grammont, French Minister at Rome, explaining the Emperor Napoleon's policy towards Rome, was published in the Moniteur of Friday, the 17th inst., and a telegraphic summary thereof was given in our town edition last week. This despatch examines the recent facts which have caused the present state of affairs in the Legations, and states the reasons of the evil, and to whom belongs the responsibility of it. The revolt of the Romagna is attributed to the insuperable repugnance of the Pope to grant reforms, and a renewal of the occupation of the Legations by foreign troops is declared to be impossible. An obstinate refusal to recognise the real nature of the present state of affairs will aggravate it. But if the Pope will discuss the question in a purely temporal point of view his Holiness will bring about, however late, changes favourable to his cause. Such a course would, at any rate, enable the French Emperor to lend his support to a conciliatory and reasonable policy.

Monday's Moniteur contains a circular, addressed by M. Rouland, the Minister of Public Instruction, to the Archbishops and Bishops of France, exhorting the clergy not to indulge in such outbursts of passion as have taken place among them, and expressing the hope that the Bishops will bring back to their duty the men who have departed from it. He reminds them that the disagreement between the Emperor and the Pope does not refer to religious but only to temporal questions, and finally warns them that disorders compromising religion and prejudicial to public peace must be prevented. The Emperor, who, as the Minister tells the Bishops, has never made use of the prohibitions with which the special laws of France arm him, now energetically wills that the laws be energetically maintained and executed. He has, however, the firm hope that the Bishops will fulfil their mission of order, peace, and conciliation.

A circular on the same subject has been addressed by the Minister of the Interior to the Prefects of Departments. "The time has arrived," says the Minister, "to put an end to the attempts at agitation on the Roman question." M. Billault instructs the prefects to prohibit, according to law, the distribution of writings and pamphlets unless duly authorised, and to report to the Council of State whenever the liberty of the pulpit is abused. He recommends them to combine moderation with firmness, as the Emperor desires peace and liberty for religion.

A meeting has been held in Paris with the object of supporting the temporal rights of the Pope. It was attended by two hundred persons, and included Orleanists, Legitimists, Bonapartists, and Republicans. There were present members of the magistracy, the Bar, public functionaries, and commercial men. A petition to the Senate was drawn up, praying it to interfere with the Government on the ground that any attempt against the temporal sovereignty of the Pope is an attempt against the liberty of conscience.

The Moniteur of Sunday publishes a Ministerial report, addressed to the Emperor by M. Rouher, on the reform of the tariff for primary materials. The Minister expresses his opinion that the epoch for the exemption of wools and cottons may be fixed for the 15th of April. The Minister further believes that the tariff for primary materials could be expressed as follows:—All wools and cottons in wool imported from countries out of Europe are exempt. If coming from other parts, and in French vessels, to be subject to a duty of 3 francs per 100 kilogrammes. If imported in foreign vessels, to pay a duty of 5 francs per 100 kilogrammes. The premiums paid on exportation will be suppressed—1. For threads of cotton and wool within two months; 2. For tissues of wool and cotton within three months. The report of the Minister also proposes modifications of the tariff for dyes and chemical products.

The Patrie of Wednesday declares itself authorised to state that the rumour respecting the intentions of the Government to establish an income tax is without any foundation whatever.

On the proposition of the Minister of War the Emperor has exercised his clemency towards 676 military prisoners in France and Algeria. Out of that number 396 have had the remainder of their punishment remitted, and 280 have obtained a reduction in their term of confinement.

A grand ball was given at the Tuileries on Sunday evening, at which were present Prince Napoleon, Princess Clothilde, Princess Mathilde, and the Princes and Princesses of the Imperial family. After the reception of the diplomatic circle and the presentations the Emperor and Empress entered the Salle des Maréchaux and dancing commenced. Their Majesties went several times through the different salons during the evening, and afterwards entered the supper-room. The ball terminated about three in the morning.——Last Saturday night a magnificent fancy ball was given by M. Fould, Minister of State, at which all the rank and fashion of Paris were present. The Emperor and Empress were in domino, and seemed much amused with the gaiety of the scene. Princess Clothilde and Prince Napoleon were also present.——On the preceding evening Count de Chasseloup Laubat gave a grand ball at the hotel of the Ministry of Algeria and the Colonies in the Place Beauveau.

M. Beaucé, the artist, specially engaged to depict events in connection with the war in Italy for this Journal, had the honour of attending at the Tuileries, by command, on Wednesday last, when he submitted to the Emperor's examination his large painting of the Battle of Solferino (a striking incident in which great fight forms the subject of one of our coloured Engravings this week), and all the sketches which he made for the Illustrated London News during the Italian campaign. His Majesty expressed his entire satisfaction with M. Beaucé's productions.

The Emperor has, according to a telegram from Paris, assured M. de Lesseps that M. Thouvenel has been instructed "to seize the first opportunity of entering into negotiations with the English Cabinet with the object of removing the last obstacles which oppose the realisation of the Suez Canal Scheme."

M. Emile Ollivier's case came on yesterday week for a final hearing on the merits before the Court of Correctional Appeals, M. Partarrieu-Laffosse presiding. M. Ollivier had been suspended from his functions as advocate, on the ground that he had imputed to the public prosecutor an appeal to violent passions. The Court confirmed the suspension of M. Ollivier.

The trial of Bishop Dupanloup for libel is fixed for the 1st of March.

The black doctor (Vries) has been brought up to hear judgment on his appeal, and the sentence of fifteen months' imprisonment pronounced against him for swindling, under the pretence of curing cancer by secret remedies divinely revealed, has been confirmed.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

Some hard fighting has taken place at Melilla. The following official bulletin from the army in Africa has been published at Madrid:—"The Moors having prepared to cannonade Melilla, Brigadier Buceta, then convalescent, attacked and carried their positions. The Spanish loss was thirty-one men. Brigadier Buceta re-entered Melilla more indisposed than before, and confided the command to the Colonel. The Moors, being very numerous, recaptured their positions; but Brigadier Buceta returned and again carried them with the loss of 182 men."

The Espana of the 15th inst. mentions as the conditions for peace with Morocco:—1. That a port on the Atlantic coast shall be conceded to Spain for ever. 2. That forty square leagues of conquered territory shall also be given up to her for the establishment of such military posts as she shall think fit. 3. That an indemnity of 500,000,000 reals (£5,000,000) shall be paid in the space of six years; and, 4. That the Spaniards shall occupy Tetuan and the banks of the river from that town to the sea until the indemnity be paid. The Espana, however, does not positively guarantee the exactitude of the statement.

If the semi-official Correspondancia can be believed, Muley Abbas, the Emperor's brother, who left Tetuan with 1000 infantry and 3000 cavalry, has been robbed of 100,000 dollars by the revolted Kabyles, and had been abandoned by all his troops except a few men. The Gazette states that, as General Buceta, Governor of Melilla, in making a sortie from that place against the Moors, violated orders given him by the General-in-Chief, he was to be placed under arrest and brought to trial.

The Madrid journals of the 16th state that the Cabinet had resolved to give Marshal O'Donnell carte blanche to treat for peace with the Moors, and that General Ustariz was to convey to him despatches to that effect. The Correspondancia, a semi-official organ, says that it "does not entertain the hope that peace will be obtained."

Most of the Madrid journals are opposed to the conclusion of peace, and demand the occupation of Tangier.

BELGIUM.

The Duke of Brabant, heir to the throne of Belgium, made an interesting speech in the Senate yesterday week, pointing out the progress already made by Belgian industry, and the necessity of making still further exertions. His Royal Highness explained the mission to China of a Belgian envoy, and urged union with England and France in that country. After passing in review the industry of Belgium as it now exists, he dwelt upon the necessity of opening new markets for Belgian produce, and to appoint Belgian agents in every part of the world; to do this effectually Belgium ought to have a great commercial port—and that port should be Antwerp.

ITALY.

M. Thouvenel's despatch has been presented by the Duke of Grammont to Cardinal Antonelli. The Secretary of the Roman States has, in his reply, confined himself to stating that immediately upon receiving the orders of the Sovereign Pontiff he will place the Nuncio at Paris in a position to communicate the intentions of the Papal Government. Twenty-five English Roman Catholic deputies have presented to the Pope a protest from the faithful, which has afforded great consolation to the Holy Father. News from Bologna states that the peasants complain of the Papal régime. Nine hundred Bavarians, enlisted for the Papal army, have arrived at Ancona; others are expected. More Austrian troops are reported to have arrived in the States of the Church.

King Victor Emmanuel has reached Milan, where he has been received with great enthusiasm. His appearance at the theatre was the signal for a complete ovation. Farini has also been received at Ferrara with great enthusiasm. The Corriere Mercantile of Genoa states that great activity is observable in the Sardinian War department since the appointment of General Fanti to that portfolio. The number of batteries in the army is being raised to thirty, eight of which consist of ordnance on a new system of rifled canon. All the battalions are being strengthened, and the infantry is being armed with the French rifled musket.

Violence is still the order of the day in Venetia, and the number of emigrants thence has, it is stated, reached nearly 90,000.

AUSTRIA.

The courier bearer of the definitive answer of Austria to the English proposals left Vienna, on the evening of the 17th instant, for Paris and London. The reply of Austria explains the reasons why the Court of Vienna could not accept the English proposals as bases for an arrangement to which the concurrence of Austria would be given by her signature. Count Rechberg explains that the proposals do not only essentially alter the basis of the European equilibrium which was founded by the treaties of 1815, but it is in open opposition to the fundamental principle upon which the legitimacy of Governments in general, and especially the Austrian monarchy, is founded. In the third instance the said proposals destroy the rights of the Italian Princes which were placed under the guarantee of Europe, and which the Emperor Francis Joseph has the sacred duty to protect in his quality of chief of the house of Hapsburg. If, induced by all the motives, Austria declines the proposed negotiations, she declares, nevertheless, that for the present she will not endeavour to undo by force of arms that which she cannot prevent, although reserving to herself full and entire liberty of action for the future.

The official Wiener Zeitung of Tuesday contains an Imperial decree by which the right of buying and possessing landed property is conceded to the Jews of Lower Austria, Moravia, Silesia, Hungary, Voywodina, and the Banat, Croatia, Slavonia, Dalmatia, and the Littoral districts. However, the Jews in Galicia, Bokowina, and Cracow may acquire and retain real property on condition only of having received their education in one of the public colleges, or of having the rank of an officer in the army. The Wiener Zeitung of Wednesday says that the question concerning the capability to possess landed property by Jews of those provinces not mentioned in the Imperial decree is reserved for decision by the future representatives of the country.

PRUSSIA.

A few days ago their Royal Highnesses Prince and Princess Frederick William were presented with a gold cup studded with jewels, as a gift from Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort to their little grandchild, the future King of Prussia. The costly chalice, which is the production of a London artist, bears the following inscription in English:—"Queen Victoria and Prince Albert to their grandson Frederick William, in remembrance of the 5th March, 1859." The date refers to the baptismal day of the little Prince.

A Berlin journal states that the Russian and Prussian Cabinets have concurred in proposing that a conference of the five great Powers shall assemble for the purpose of settling the affairs of Italy; but an agreement has not yet been come to respecting the basis on which to hold a conference.

The Prussian Government has sent a reply to the Saxon memorandum on the military organisation of the Confederation. This document combats the deductions of Baron de Beust, and especially repels the insinuation that the adoption of the Prussian propositions would be equivalent to the abdication of their sovereignty on the part of the lesser States. In demanding that the federal forces should be incorporated with the armies of Prussia and Austria, Prussia only meant such a measuse to be applicable during the war. When peace ensued each State would recover its natural rights. Prussia also strenuously denies all intention of encroaching on the sovereign rights of her confederates.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

The vote on these proposals will take place on the 8th of March.

THE VICTORIA CROSS.—The Gazette of yesterday week, as we recorded in our town edition last week, contained an official notice, which, after referring to the resolve, previously declared, to confer this high distinction on non-military persons who have borne arms against the mutineers in the late operations in India, signified her Majesty's intention to confer the decoration on Mr. W. Fraser M'Donnell, of the Bengal Civil Service, magistrate of Sarum, for great coolness and bravery on July 30, 1857, during the retreat of the British troops from Arrah, in having climbed, under an incessant fire, outside the boat in which he and several soldiers were, up to the rudder, and with considerable difficulty cut through the lashing which secured it to the side of the boat. On the lashing being cut, the boat obeyed the helm, and thus thirty-five European soldiers escaped certain death. This notice also states that her Majesty has graciously signified her intention to confer the decoration of the Victoria Cross on Captain Cafe, 56th Bengal Native Infantry, and on Lieutenant Brown, 1st European Bengal Fusiliers, for their bravery in rescuing wounded soldiers under a heavy fire from the enemy; and the same distinction is to be conferred on Private Dennis Dempsey, 10th Regiment (1st battalion), for having, at Lucknow, on the 14th of March, 1858, carried a powder-bag through a burning village with great coolness and gallantry, for the purpose of mining a passage in rear of the enemy's position.

MILITARY DRILL IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Last Saturday a meeting was held at the Thatched House Tavern, London, for the purpose of adopting measures for the establishment of preliminary military drill in our great educational establishments as a sort of nursery for rifle volunteers in years to come. Lord Elcho occupied the chair, and the meeting was well attended by a large number of highly influential personages, including the Provost of Eton; Lord West; the Rev. G. R. Gleig, Prebendary of St. Paul's and Chaplain of the Forces; Sir De Lacy Evans, and several members of Parliament. Opinions were read from Lord Palmerston, the Bishop of London, Lord Brougham, Lord Lyndhurst, the Dean of Christ Church (late Master of Westminster School), the Earl of Shaftesbury, and others, in favour of the movement; and Lord Elcho stated that he had also received the concurrence of the Duke of Cambridge, Earl Granville, Lord John Russell, the Duke of Argyll, Lord Ashburnham, and others thereon. Resolutions were adopted unanimously expressive of an opinion that, with a view to the permanence of a volunteer force, it was desirable that elementary military drill should be established in all public and other schools as a part of the general education, being also calculated to afford physical development as well as great moral improvement of the pupils. One resolution, moved by the Provost of Eton, who ought to be an authority on such matters, was as follows:—"That where elementary drill has been established it has been found to conduce to the discipline and order of schools, and to the mental advancement of scholars as well as to their physical development and improvement."

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

A VALUABLE discovery has just been made in the vaults of an eminent London banker. The discovery consists of a large box of letters containing the correspondence of Mr. Bradshaw, Secretary to the Treasury in the reign of George III., a man very well known to the readers of Walpole's Letters and of the Secret History of the Court Intrigues when Queen Victoria's paternal grandfather was King. The letters are of the most confidential nature—written by men like the Duke of Grafton, Lord Bute, Lord North, Lord Rockingham, Lord Hillsborough, Lord Barrington, Richard Rigby, Sir Philip Francis, and Mr. Boswell's Dr. Samuel Johnson. Johnson's letters relate to his pension; and there are traces of "Junius" in this valuable box of papers.

This mention of "Junius" reminds us that the opening article in the March number of Mr. Thackeray's Cornhill Magazine contains a pleasant report of a conversation with Lord Macaulay touching "Junius," detailing a discovery, hitherto unpublished, fixing Sir Philip Francis as "Junius" with additional precision. The "Bradshaw Papers" will possibly determine the question.

Only a Knight Commander of the Bath! Thus died, a few days back, Napier—the Napier, the historian of the Peninsular War. This Napier was in every respect a very great man, a soldier true to the steel he wore, and who gave to all time, with the fidelity of a soldier and the skill of a master of the English language, an imperishable book. As long as the English language lasts, as long as deeds of unsurpassed skill in managing men and conquering other men are held in esteem, Napier's History will be read by readers heroic in arms and conversant with the English language. It was said in our hearing, by a man skilled in letters—and we much admire the saying—that Napier's History was written with the point of a bayonet. That, indeed, was a steel-pointed pen! "These Napiers," it was said by a scholar only on Tuesday last, "form a family of great men. We have had the lives of the Norths and the Lindsays—why not the lives of the Napiers?" A man not unskilled in scholarship or society added, not unhappily, "Yes, by all means; but I would rather have written Napier's 'History of the Peninsular War' than have invented Napier's Logarithms." These sayings were advanced in a large company of wits, and the hearers justified what the latter speaker advanced. Never did a great book come into the world under greater difficulties than did Napier's "History of the Peninsular War." Murray, the greatest publisher in London, published the first volume. The volume attracted attention. Napier had fought through the Peninsular War; Murray—not the publisher, but the Quartermaster-General of Wellington—had gone through the same war. "This," said Sir George Murray to John Murray, "is not the book. I will write you the book." Murray bowed to Murray, and volume two of Napier's noble work was published by another bookseller. And what did Murray do for Murray?—some four Quartermaster articles for the Quarterly! The articles are forgotten; Napier in his "History" lives for all time.

Our churches, said a wit of the Sedley period, are turned into theatres, and our theatres into churches. You remember the fine line in Cowley:—

> God the first Garden made, and the first City Cain.

Loving the Church of England well, in a Laud and George Herbert spirit, I wish from the very recesses of my heart tha these squabbles about the unnecessary parts of a love of God could come to an end. A religious war is the worst of all wars. The Bishop (Tait) is doing his work well; but he should be armed with greater power. He will do his work discreetly. And in this we concur, with all well-wishers to any religion. Sixty policemen inside the Church of St. George-in-the-East for the preservation of religion, and only fifty persons forming a congregation in St. Ann's, Soho.

We have read Mr. Hamilton's book in defence of Shakespeare against Mr. Collier. At present we shall not pronounce an opinion upon it; but we may in the matter of gossip just mention shat this little bit of news, that the genuineness of the "Shakspere" signature on the folio "Florio," for which the country paid so much, will soon again be called in question—and a little unpleasantly. Since this was written Mr. Collier has made his reply to the British Museum attack; and the Athenæum of last week contains a long and able vindication of him, written, it is understood, by Mr. John Bruce, whose knowledge of English history and of handwriting of the seventeenth century is indisputable.

We hear it is said—"What a pity it is that the amateur burlesque 'The Forty Thieves' at the Lyceum Theatre, and the volunteer ball at the Floral Hall of Covent-garden Theatre should both be fixed for the same night!"

The Commons have fallen by accident into a mean kind of mind, and the "Miscellaneous Estimates" of her Majesty's Government are now to be revised by a Committee of the House. This Committee must, necessarily, have great power, and the formation of the Committee is a point of great importance. We in England are not all Manchester men. Trade is not everything. We are not a nation alone of tea and tobacco, of household troops and metropolitan police. We are not a nation of shopkeepers; and this England is not to be governed, and will not be governed, by vestrymen representatives, or by clamorous members returned by the most ignorant portion of either a thinly-populated or a largely-populated borough of any county in England and Wales, Scotland and Ireland, and Berwick-upon-Tweed not excepted.

Gladstone's cold was, it is said, only a bit of Lord Chatham's acting. The delay was a convenience, and Gladstone was only a gladiator. In this, of course, we do not believe; but there was a Surrey Theatre and my-Lord-Chatham-like look about the whole delay. What is it not worth—income tax included—for a Chancellor of the Exchequer or a Rothschild to gain on time?

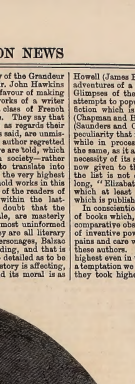
At a meeting of the members of the Royal Institute of British Architects, held on Monday evening, her Majesty's gracious sanction to the award of the Royal medal to Sydney Smirke, R.A., Fellow, was duly announced by the honorary secretary.

IMPORTANT TO RAILWAY TRAVELLERS.—Mr. Lancaster, a wine-merchant, of Stowmarket, Suffolk, sued the Eastern Counties Railway Company in the Ipswich County Court, yesterday week, for £3 16s. 9d., as compensation for the inconvenience he had suffered through the delay of an express train. The Judge, in announcing his decision, said the company in their time-bill stated that they bound themselves to make every exertion to ensure punctuality, but that they did not hold themselves responsible for failing. The question was, whether in the present case they had made every exertion. He considered that they had, that they were protected by the proviso in their time-bill, and that they could not be accountable for the circumstances in which the plaintiff was placed. Judgment for the defendants.



LITERATURE.

REMINISCENCES OF THE LATE THOMAS ASSHETON SMITH, ESQ., ON THE PURSUITS OF AN ENGLISH COUNTRY GENTLEMAN. By SIR JOHN E. EARDLEY WILMOT, Bart. John Murray, Albemarle-street.

The latter part of this title really embodies "the reason why" the book was written. Mr. Assheton Smith himself left no material. Although he had many good hunting stories, which he could tell his friends when he was in the vein to chat, about Tom Wiggfield, Jack Shirley, Dick Burton, and the other companions of his Queen and Lincolnshire days, he kept no regular hunting record. Such very unjust reflections, however, were cast upon him by one of the leading daily journals, which described him as a man of one solitary idea, and living only for the stable and the kennel, that the publication of the present biography became almost imperative upon his friends. It is mainly compiled the thoughts of his widow during the few months she survived him, and she has intrusted the keeping of his memory to a kind and loving hands.

For half a century the fame of Mr. Assheton Smith has been the theme of every sporting writer, and the editor has not only gathered every item of interest about him from the Field, the Sporting Magazine, "Silk and Scarlet," "The Post and the Paddock," and other works, but he has interwoven a large number of fresh anecdotes which old friends have heard and treasured up in their Tedworth visits. Mr. Smith began his characteristic career by taking a Nazaritish vow, as a boy, in consequence of an unjust flogging, that he would never do anything all his life long from violence or compulsion, and right rigidly he kept it. Jack Musters spoiled his beauty in that ever-memorable drawn fight at Alton; and it was by our hero's rough-and-ready appeal to this wager of battle, when Nottingham was placarded with "No Fox-hunting M.P.!" and the mob yelled like furies, that even in that birthplace of Bendigo the Hittite he gained a hushed hearing. In fox-hunting enthusiasm he had no peer. One day his friends observed him put down the county paper with an expression of deep horror and grief, and, when they expected to hear of some fearful death at home or revolution in France, he observed that a dog fox had been found next to death in a barn!

It is, however, to the other side of his character that our author has applied himself with most delight, relying more on his own observation, and not so much on the aid of others. He delights to sketch him in his Welsh home, conferring happiness and comfort on hundreds in those wonderful slateworks at Llanberris which produced when some £30,000 a year, and dispensing his wealth with a bountiful and yet discriminating hand. His steam-yacht building, and the immense energy he brought to bear upon it, are also described at length; and his claim to be the practical originator of the wave-line most impartially considered. None of his eccentricities are withheld. Perhaps we do not get the story of the surveyors who took their reckonings one wet Sunday when he was at church; but there is no blinking the fact that "The Irate Provincial" who had to be fined £5 for an assault at a metropolitan police-office, and nearly repeated the offence before the very judgment-seat, was the great Julius Cæsar of the hunting world. These freaks of temper were nevertheless more speckx on a fine English character. Like his ancestral friend the Duke of Wellington, who honoured him as a man of iron soul like himself, he knew his duty, and he did it. He loved well to see the "Hampshire woodlands, stripped for business," but the pleasure of hewing them with his Bertrams, and his Nigels, and his Saffrons, never lured him into forgetfulness that, as a Christian, a landlord, and an employer, there were far higher aims of life. The book is very beautifully got up, and embellished with a portrait of Mr. Smith after Abraham Cooper, R.A., and other little sporting woodcuts illustrating the text.

GENERAL SIR W. F. P. NAPIER, K.C.B.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY KILBURN.—SEE SUPPLEMENT, PAGE 180.

IF probably has not entered into the calculation of any but those who are in their various ways among the initiated in the world of literature how great is the quantity of printed matter, nearly bound, and garnished with the names of respectable publishers, which issues weekly and monthly from the press. The books which are heard of through the medium of notices in newspapers, and seen in the advertisements, form but a tithe of the number of volumes which load the tables of editors, who have only single copies, and must therefore crowd the shelves of booksellers to an extent which is scarcely conceivable. Every now and then the accumulation in the former case grows so formidable that the duty of compassing the slain of that direst notice, becomes a simple impossibility. Once in a way, with a desperate courage, we plunge into the centre of the mass, and endeavour, as best we can, to cut our way out of it. One of these efforts is now before the public, and, to the extent of our strength and, above all, of our space, we will try what we can do in the way of dealing with a considerable number of good-looking volumes.

The first on which our hand falls bears on a personal interest in the author. Miss Kate Crichton, the writer of "Before the Dawn, a Tale of Italy" (Skeet), early in the year 1852, made a very successful appearance as a dramatic singer. After receiving continued encouragement for several months she left England and proceeded to Milan, with a view of qualifying herself to appear at the Italian Opera House on her return home. Soon after her arrival in Italy a dangerous fever so impaired her vocal powers as to compel her to relinquish a profession which had been commenced under circumstances of such promise. She was thus induced to devote her attention to, and seek a vocation in, literature in lieu of that for which she had been designed. During her stay in Milan an insurrection occurred in that city, which terminated in a number of scenes of horror and suffering, a description of which, with other real incidents that came under her notice, she has introduced into this tale, for the purpose of giving some idea of the cruel and bloody scenes the people of Italy before the "dawn" of that happier future which she hopes is tending to that consummation. The main object is, of course, interwoven with a tale of dramatic life and affections in various phases, in the development of which the authoress shows much knowledge of the human, and, of course, the most of woman's, heart, as well as of the influences of the world and the force of circumstances on the nature of ordinary, in the sense of not uncommon, kinds. There are touches of life and manners in Germany included in the current of the story, which, on the whole, we prefer to those of Italy, which are probably intended to be the most prominent. We will venture to say that, on the whole, Miss Crichton gives as much promise in this, her new vocation, as she is reported to have held out in her primary calling; and we can only hope that she will meet with no check in the career she has last adopted.

Upon the face of it it would seem a doubtful experiment to offer to the English reading public a series of the works of Balzac. This, however, has been done by Messrs. Saunders and Otley, and the first volume has been published, being "The History of the Grandeur and Downfal of César Birotteau," translated by Mr. John Hawkins Simpson. The projectors argue, oddly enough, in favour of making accessible to every class of English readers the works of a writer whose fame is rightly or wrongly associated with a class of French literature which is not to be named to ears polite. They say that Balzac's works may be divided into three classes as regards their probable good or bad effects. A few volumes, it is said, are unmistakably objectionable, and these it is supposed their author regretted having ever published. Some, again, there are, we are told, which could not possibly have any bad effect on French society—rather the reverse—and which it might be unfortunate to withhold from English without careful revision; while many are of the very highest moral tone, such as will sooner or later be household works in this country. We leave this reasoning to the judgment of the readers of the volume before us, which, we agree, comes within the last-mentioned category. There can be no little doubt that the characters in "César Birotteau," male and female, are masterly delineations of French middle-class life. Even the most uninformed and unlearned reader must see at a glance that they are all literary photographs. In the minute anatomy of his personages, Balzac certainly in this tale seems to us to exceed Fielding, and that is saying a great deal. At times the dissection is so detailed as to be almost tiresome, but it is abundantly real. The story is affecting, though simple matter of fact in its materials, and its moral is as good as it is obvious. So long as the series is confined to works of this description we can have little or no objection to Balzac disclosed. Of the translation it is quite possible to speak favourably. Though very good English, there is a French flavour all through it, which gives, on the whole, a very tolerable idea of the original.

M. Octave Feuillet has acquired some note as a writer of fiction in his own country. Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin have recently published a translation of a tale of that author, entitled "The Marquis D'Hauterive; or the Romance of a Poor Young Man." Both as regards any pretension to high-principled originality, is a very interesting and a very well-constructed story. The earlier scenes, which are laid in Paris, are wrought out with considerable power, and the remainder of the story runs through a series of pictures of French provincial life, which are painted with the skill of an artist, and toned by the feelings and style of a gentleman. The slight infusion of improbability which assists in bringing about the happy catastrophe is not by any means inexcusable, and is redeemed by the necessity for the introduction and delineation of one of the most original characters in the book—that Mlle. de Porhiet-Gaël who in the year that she saw her 86th spring looked like a reed preserved in silk, and who was the last scion of a very noble race, whose earliest ancestors were thought to have been discovered among the fabled Kings of ancient Armorica, and who was of opinion that the Napoleons were of a good and noble family, but that there were better.

In taking up a volume entitled "Old Friends and New Acquaintances," by Miss Agnes Strickland (Simpkin and Marshall), one feels a little surprise at discovering that of which we were certainly not aware before, that the graceful and careful historian of "The Queens of England" has been accustomed, shall we say, disjecta in loco, in the shape of a number of small tales contributed from time to time to various periodicals. On examination it was to be observed that these literary "nugæ" are all marked by the characteristic good sense and simplicity of style which distinguished her authoress. There is nothing particularly striking in the groundwork of the stories, though many of them are founded on matters of interest which are romantic, but, so to speak, not exactly uncommon; but the chief feature of the series is a delineation of peasant, seafaring, and middle-class life in Suffolk, the dialogue being interspersed with local phraseology and idiom, which gives the whole a smack of originality. This little work gives one the idea that, if Miss Strickland were so inclined, she might, out of her stores of historical lore, pick out a subject which she might work up successfully into a romance of some period embraced in her celebrated biographies.

Within one bound we are compelled to include "New Relations and Bachelors' Hall" (Westerton); "Alive or Dead," by Charles Howell (James Blackwood), an interesting narrative enough of the adventures of a certain "Curate of St. Crispins;" "Yes or No, or Glimpses of the Great Conflict" (Macmillan and Co.), one of the attempts to popularize religious opinion and principle in the form of fiction which is now so prevalent; "The Sailor Isle Tragedy" (Chapman and Hall), which is a Scotch, and "The Land of the Kaik" (Saunders and Otley), which is an Irish, story, the latter having the peculiarity that it went to press under the name of "Lorna," and while in process of incubation there another work appeared with the same name, so it appears by our title, thus involving the necessity of its supersession and the adoption of that by which it is now given to the public; and lastly, but only for the present, for the list is not quite exhausted, that may probably be received are long, "Elizabath; a Story which does not end in Marriage," an idea which at least has the merit of novelty in the records of fiction, and which is published by R. Grant, of Edinburgh.

In conscientiously looking over the not inconsiderable collection of books which, in the very nature of things, are destined to a less comparative obscurity, we cannot but be struck with the sevidences of inventive power which, probably, and, generally speaking, the pains and care which have been bestowed upon their production by these authors. They belong to a class which is far from being the highest even in the genus to which they belong, but which holds out a temptation we presume not to be resisted by many writers, who, if they took higher ground at first, would probably be more really successful. If the art of writing up to certain standards was more easily acquired than it probably that immediate success which is represented by acceptance by a publisher, and a place in circulating libraries of the second class, would not be attained, we believe that many an author who stops short at the point we have indicated would reach to better and more enduring things. Only, if not all, of the books of which we have here given a flying list might be read with sufficient return of amusement, and many of them of interest, and we should be glad if our hurried glance at them in the bulk should tend to introduce any or all of them to the notice of our numerous readers.

The name of Schleiermacher is probably not much known in this country, but it is a name which has been recognised in Germany as that of a man who for a quarter of a century exercised in Berlin the double function of a teacher in the University and in the Church, who approved himself a fearless Christian in times of imminent peril, and a highly-inspired preacher during a period of great religious indifference. It is said of him that in a most critical juncture in the history of Prussia he contributed as much if not more than any individual to keep alive in all classes the pride of nationality and the love of independence, to the awakening religious earnestness and the quickening of moral sentiments. Everready to sacrifice himself in the interest, not only of his country, but of the whole German nation, then bending under the yoke of France, his example acted contagiously in Berlin, more especially where his influence was supreme, and sustained the people in that determination to liberate themselves when an opportunity offered, which was ultimately so nobly carried out. On the 15th of February, 1834, a funeral procession was seen moving through the streets of Berlin—the like of which that capital had rarely witnessed before, inasmuch as it was by a spontaneous movement of every class that the civil and military functionaries were honouring in death the name of Frederick Ernst Schleiermacher. Since that time his name and works have continued in high repute, but it has been only lately that his biography, often demanded, has appeared, founded on his own autobiography and his letters, and which has been given to the English public under the title of "The Life of Schleiermacher, translated from the German by Frederica Rowan (Smith and Elder). There is much in the work to make it fully desirable here it was read, it was as cordially received as it has been in Germany; and we do not doubt but that the English public, though less warmly interested in its subject-matter, will recognise in it the labours, profound yet unflagging, of an uncompromising contender for great principles. The letters which occupy the greater portion of the volumes before us of course help us best to a portrait of the mind and heart of the writer, and they prove him to have been as warm in his affections and excellent in private life as he was eminent for his scientific attainments and for vigour and eloquence in his public career.

The Manners, Customs, Institutions and Incidents of Missionary Labour,"just published by Seeley and Jackson, even the very general and most unthinking public will find a good deal to interest them, for the subject-matter embraces a variety of descriptions of Chinese life and scenery, and the work includes a range of pictorial illustrations, with coloured engravings, over Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Smyrna, a large portion of savage Africa, the colder and more desolate regions of North America, the climate and scenery of South America, Cuba, New Zealand, and even a part of the interior of Russia. The views are selected from those published monthly in the Church Missionary Gleaner, and the illustrations have been compiled partly from that periodical, and partly from other sources. While giving a notion of the wide extent and extent of missionary labour, the work in its present shape is not purely a religious one, although we are from saying this as intending it as an indictment to the Church.

Messrs. Day and Sons have recently produced a very nice illustrated volume, in folio, of "Studies of Animals," drawn from sketches by Miss L. M. Cubley, who has also supplied the descriptions. During a stay in Palestine the ruminating cattle of the East caught her childhood, Miss Cubley made numerous sketches of various objects of interest, figures, and groups, which on her return home were regarded in the pictorial form which they have assumed in the volume before us. The only merit that she herself claims, both for them and for the descriptions, are their truthfulness; but we think that other merits of skill in design and pointedness in execution will be recognised by those who look at the work. Among the subjects which we desire particularly to designate are "The First Sight of Jerusalem from the Jaffa Plain," "A Street in Jerusalem," "The Via Dolorosa," and "Still Country of the Land of Moab for poor." The sketches of interiors are very good, though, as we think, a little harder than those of scenery or of animals, the latter of which is a very excellent bale-book, for it does not pretend to take any rank as a literary production.

The members of the Royal Association for the Promotion of the Fine Arts of Scotland have had presented to them a memorial of Robert Burns of no ordinary character and pretension. It consists of a series of illustrations of the song of "Auld Lang Syne," by George Harvey, R.S.A., engraved by Mr. Lumb Stocks, A.R.A. Nothing can be more happy than the idea of some of the pictures, while all of them are full of character and excellent grouping. The execution of the engravings, which are five in number, is admirable. The volume, as a whole, is an admirable specimen of the luxurious in art as applied to the glorification, in its true sense, of the poet whose immortal lyric it illustrates.

EXTRACT from the BRADFORD OBSERVER of 16th February, 1860:—
HORNBY CASTLE.—"We understand that the magnificent estate of Hornby Castle is in the market for private competition, and that several applications have already been made by persons of fortune, with a view to the purchase. We allude to the circumstance as one of deep interest in this neighbourhood. Anything relating to one of the finest properties in all England, comprising a baronial residence fit for the occupation of a monarch, must needs be of importance in any part of England; but to us who live in North Lancashire it is a matter of deep concern to speculate on who may be the possible possessor of a domain so splendid as Hornby Castle. We have heard the names of persons in treaty mentioned, but in the present stage of negotiation we are not at liberty to mention any."—Lancaster Gazette Feb. 11. [Since the above appeared in the Lancaster Gazette of Saturday last we have heard from undoubted authority that John Foster, Esq., of Cliffe Hill, near Halifax, has purchased this magnificent estate, consisting, as we are informed, of the Honour and Manor of Hornby, the Borough of Hornby, the Manor of Tatham, and about 3500 acres of land; the Livings of Hornby, Tatham, and Lowgill, the right of sporting over upwards of 24,000 acres of land, and of fishing over seven miles or more of the River Lune, and the whole length of its tributary streams—the Wenning, Hindburn, and Roeburn.]

The Crystal Palace at Sydenham was established for the purpose of providing on a large scale the means of intellectual improvement and physical recreation for all classes of the community. In this respect the experiment has been so successful that, although situated on the southern side of the Thames, at a distance of about eight miles by railway from London-bridge, and, consequently, difficult of access to the immense majority of the metropolitan population, it appears by the last report that 1,381,163 persons visited it during the twelve months ending the 31st of October, 1859, and the net profit realised during the same period amounted to £45,315 10s. 8d., equivalent to 7½ per cent on the capital of this company—viz., £600,000.

The Palace of the People at Muswell-hill will be readily accessible to the vast population on the northern side of the River, numbering more than a million and a half of persons, who will not be subject to the inconvenience of being obliged to pass through the crowded streets of London. No Institution of a similar character exists in this quarter; and it is a remarkable fact that this populous and wealthy district is entirely destitute of any great centre of attraction, where the improvement and recreation of the masses can be combined.

The site selected for the Palace of the People possesses peculiar advantages for the erection of a building devoted to general instruction and amusement. It is on the line of the Great Northern Railway, within a quarter of an hour's journey from King's cross, and, from its elevated position, it commands extensive and beautiful views in all directions. The Palace will occupy nearly the centre of a circle including, within a radius of six miles, Hornsey, Colney Hatch, Highgate, Kentish Town, Hampstead, Hendon, Finchley, Totteridge, Barnet, East Barnet, Southgate, Edmonton, Enfield, Stoke Newington, Tottenham, Clapton, Homerton, Hackney, Kingsland, Stamford Hill, Finsbury, Islington, Highbury, Holloway, Camden Town, Hyde Park, the Regent's Park, Maida Hill, St. John's Wood, Westbourne-terrace, Paddington, and Bayswater. From many of these places it will be within an easy walk, and from all the others it will be within a short drive by omnibus or carriage.

Passengers arriving by the London and North-Western, Midland, Great Western, and Eastern Counties Railways will reach the Palace without traversing the streets of London, and the trains of the Blackwall, North London, and Metropolitan Railways will convey visitors every quarter of an hour from Fenchurch-street, Farringdon street, Paddington, and the intermediate stations. The works on the Metropolitan Railway are already commenced, and it is expected to be completed before the opening of the Palace.

The estate which has been secured for the purposes of the company consists in the whole of about 450 acres of the finest land in the county of Middlesex, well supplied with water, thoroughly drained, and interspersed with ornamental timber. It is intended to appropriate 150 acres to the special use of the palace and grounds. A reserve of 30 acres will be made in favour of Benevolent Institutions connected with Art, Science, Literature, Music, Horticulture, and the Railway interest. The remainder of the estate (about 270 acres) is admirably adapted for the erection of Suburban Villas.

It is impossible to estimate the value which this surplus land will ultimately realise in consequence of the construction of the Palace and of the Branch Railway running through it, whereby direct access will be secured to the heart of London, over the Great Northern and metropolitan lines.

The Palace of the People is projected in no spirit of opposition to the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. Experience has proved that fair competition is favourable to all sound enterprises; and, although the range of local visitors which the situation of the Palace of the People must command would seem to be of itself sufficient to ensure success, the general public may expect to derive advantage from the stimulus which each undertaking will receive from the efforts of the other.

In designing the Palace of the People, the Architect (Mr. Owen Jones) has endeavoured to secure some important additional attractions over its predecessors in Hyde Park and at Sydenham, combined with a considerable saving in expense.

A large dome, visible from all parts of the building, will contain a Winter Garden, in which a proper heat will be maintained, without inconvenience, or injury to the rest of the Palace. Semicircular colonnades at each end of the nave will be devoted to Refreshment Courts.

A spacious Concert Room, or Lecture Theatre, surrounded by corridors, projects from the centre of the building on the north side. This Theatre will contain many thousand persons comfortably, and the corridors will enable them to take their seats and to disperse with facility. Beneath the platform on which the Concert Room stands is the Railway Station, where passengers will at once enter the building, under cover, without the fatigue of a long ascent. Visitors by carriages and on horseback will alight under a glazed corridor.

In arranging the plan of the grounds, Mr. John Spencer, of Bowood, has endeavoured not only to make them objects of beauty and interest, but to furnish instructive examples of gardening.

Ample space is provided for out-door amusements, including Archery, Cricket, and Riding; and, by means of a carriage drive, which will be carried round the grounds, invalids and equestrians will be able to witness these sports, and to enjoy the beauties of the scenery, without alighting.

A distinctive feature of the Palace of the People will be the endeavour to render the resources of the institution subservient to the cause of popular education. English History, Geography, Astronomy, Geology, Mineralogy, and Mining will all be illustrated in a systematic manner; and Horticulture, Economic Botany, and Ornamental Planting will be practically taught and illustrated on an extensive scale.

Provision will be made for a fund to be applied to the promotion of this object by means of lectures, prizes, and otherwise; the control and disposition of which will be confided to a council of distinguished men, who will preside over the Educational Department. The Right Hon. Lord Brougham has kindly consented to accept the office of President of this Council.

Special advantages will be offered to Colleges, Schools, and Mechanics' Institutes throughout the kingdom; and meetings of such bodies as may become permanently associated with the undertaking will be held in the Palace at convenient periods.

An agreement will be entered into with the Great Northern Railway Company for the working of the railway to and from the Palace, on terms of mutual advantage, and such as will ensure ample accommodation to visitors.

THE FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS ARE AS FOLLOWS:—The shares will be of the value of £10 each, and the liability of each shareholder is limited to the amount of his holding. £2 10s. per share will be payable on allotment. Three instalments of £2 10s. each will be payable on June 30, 1860, December 31, 1860, and June 30, 1861, respectively.

Every original subscriber for not less than ten shares will be entitled to receive a free ticket, giving admission to the Palace and grounds for a period of ten years after the opening, in addition to dividends.

Taking as a basis of calculation the ascertained results at the Crystal Palace, and applying these results to the proposed undertaking, with the additional attractions and facilities of access above referred to, and regard being had to the greatly-reduced amount of capital required, a handsome return on the share may be confidently reckoned upon.

Application for Shares may be addressed in the annexed form, to the Directors, at the Offices of the Company, No. 61, Gresham House, Old Broad-street, City.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1860.

MR. GLADSTONE won his Magenta gallantly, and with extraordinary damage to the enemy. The battle has been renewed, and is raging while we write, but the Opposition army is dispirited and charges languidly, and all seems tending towards a Ministerial Solferino. The latest despatches from the scene of conflict will be found elsewhere. The Chancellor of the Exchequer distinguished himself in the first engagement by a feat of arms of the most brilliant character, and none of his own Homeric heroes could have more terribly "poured in thunder on the foe." Dropping martial metaphor, it may be said that the best debater in the House of Commons delivered, in answer to Mr. Disraeli—no unworthy antagonist—a speech in which the lucidity of the argument was worthy of the powerful declamation of the orator. When Mr. Gladstone addresses himself in his best manner to his work, as he did upon the occasion in question, the House of Commons is justly proud of its illustrious member. Sometimes, like Burke, > he goes on repining,

> And thinks of convincing while they think of dining

(or rather of dividing, for he seldom throws himself away upon the Impransi); but there was no such waste of thought on the occasion in question, when he closed with his adversary like a man who meant mischief;—and he did it. Mr. Disraeli knows best whether it was wise to get his forces so exceedingly well beaten at the beginning of the financial campaign; but that is his affair and Prince Rupert's. Sixty-three is an awkward-looking number in a preliminary majority.

Macbeth speaks of "untying the winds, and letting them fight against the churches." The Emperor of the French, persevering in his determination not to be injured more than he can help by priestly malevolence, has turned his lawyers on his clergy, and has signified that he who put down ultramontanist journalism will bear no disloyal demonstrations by ultramontanist ecclesiastics. A very strong order on the subject is put into circulation, and may, perhaps, bring his Majesty nearer to the excommunication said to be preparing for him in the arsenal of the Vatican. If the French clergy would only read history they would see how much nobler was the attitude of the Church of France when she was resisting the anti-national tyranny of Rome than at any other period of her existence; but this is an "idea" for which, we fear, the Gallican clergy are not inclined to make war. They, as a body, prefer the traditional influence they derive from a connection with the City of the Hills and the veneration of the ignorant. At present, however, they seem to be in terror of the strong hand of the nephew of him who dared to imprison and menace the Pope himself, a stronger Pope, moreover, than Pius IX., now, it is said, offering all kinds of reforms if allowed to retain the Romagna. As the brazen head said, "Time was."

It is understood that the Duke of Tetuan, who has had experience of the truth that "the absent are always wrong," especially in the palace of Queen Isabella II., desires to finish the Morocco campaign, and return to Madrid. But the Spanish people think that more ought to be done in Africa, and their eyes are on Tangier. There appears as great hurry on the part of the Moorish Emperor to make the submissions demanded by the conquerors. The atrocities which have been perpetrated by the more savage tribes of Moors upon the unhappy Jews in Tetuan are worthy to be mentioned in history beside those which the Spaniards and their priests have, in times not so very long past, inflicted upon the same unhappy people in Spain, though we do not read that any of the Jews have been burned alive in the principal square of Tetuan in presence of the Moorish authorities, and to the sound of mocking music. It is due to the Spaniards of the present day to record that their entrance into the captured city has been the signal for the cessation of outrage and the establishment of something as like order and law as could be expected under the exceptional circumstances of the occupation. Rifled cannon and the electric telegraph are strangely new introductions to Morocco, and it may be reasonably hoped that a compulsory civilisation may in due course lead to one of a better nature.

Until the Budget fight at home shall be fought out there will be little other Parliamentary news. On the principle that Parliament, like the elephant's trunk, can both root up an oak and pick up a pin, some of its members, titled and untitled, ask it to occupy its august leisure by enactments of the smallest character. One legislator wants the weights of racehorses adjusted by a decree that might more properly issue from the Jockey Club, and another proposed a legislation to prevent maid servants from standing on window sills to clean the panes. When we have been told that even the organ nuisance, which injures property and drives the student wild, was but a thing to be taken up by Parliament, it is hardly to be supposed that we should have acts de minimis like the handicap of the turf swindler or the duster of the housemaid. The latter "puerility" has indeed been disposed of. Members of both Houses are also asked to read a mercilessly long pamphlet, in which Colonel Rathborne addresses himself to prove that Mr. Disraeli encouraged him to write against the late East India Company, and then sacrificed him, instead of rewarding him in the way it is said the distinguished patron of the Colonel engaged to do. But, even for the satisfaction of finding a case made out against a public man, people will not tolerate the indignation that waxes so awfully voluminous.

We deplore that our weekly record should have to include notice of some lamentable catastrophes. An emigrant-vessel from France, and also the well-known Ondine, have been lost, with a fearful destruction of life, the details in the latter case being of the most heartrending kind. A railway accident has also occurred near Tottenham, and several valuable lives have been sacrificed, while a large number of persons have been much injured. Among natural deaths, the two that will be most noticed are those of the aged Bishop of Rochester (Dr. Murray), and of Mr. Henry Drummond, the representative of West Surrey, a gentleman remarkable for his learning, courage, and new theological views. The see vacant by the first of these deaths is much too large, and should be divided. St. Albans, which is in it, would make an admirable centre for a diocese on this side the water, and has an Abbey ready to become a cathedral.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Rev. J. W. Laughlin, Rector of St. Peter's, Saffron-hill, was presented by his congregation with a suit of silk robes, and Mrs. Laughlin with his portrait, on Monday last, the anniversary of their wedding-day.

A series of meetings of shipbuilders, and of gentlemen interested in naval architecture, will be held in London next week, on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, at the Society of Arts, John-street, Adelphi, for the purpose of inaugurating the new Institution of Naval Architects.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.—On Wednesday evening a number of American and English gentlemen assembled together at the New York Hotel, Leicester-street, for the purpose of celebrating the 128th anniversary of the immortal American General and statesman.

A LUNATIC, named Alfred Elliott, who some months back attempted to penetrate into Windsor Castle under the delusion that he was Duke of York, Prince of Wales, &c., has been again at large, threatening to force admission into her Majesty's presence, with a view of establishing his right to occupy the position of the Prince of Wales. The lunatic was arrested on Monday night, and, on the certificate of Dr. Winslow, conjoined with the warrant of a magistrate, has been removed to Hanwell County Lunatic Asylum.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—At the meeting of this society on Monday evening next papers will be read on the following subjects:—"Africa, S., Discovery of a new River flowing to the East, in lat. 17° 30′ S., long. 19° E.," by C. J. Andersson, Esq.; "Proposed Expedition up the Congo," by Capt. N. B. Bedingfeld, R.N., F.R.G.S.; "Proceedings of the British North American Exploring Expedition between the Rocky Mountains and Vancouver Island," by Capt. Palliser, F.R.G.S., communicated by the Duke of Newcastle.

THE GREAT METROPOLITAN SEWER is about to be commenced in the Stratford district, and during the last three months from forty to fifty navvies have been ascertaining the nature of the soil between Stratford and Barking Creek. London blue clay is found on an average 16 feet below the surface, but in some places it lies from 20 feet to 27 feet deep. In the vicinity of Barking Creek there is a fine gravelly soil, and deposits of shells which have been discovered lead to the conclusion that at a remote period the district was covered by the sea.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.—The disturbances in this church attained a milder form on Sunday. In the forenoon there were some fifty policemen present, who were ranged along the passages in case their services should be required. The congregation was small, not over 400. The greatest quietness prevailed, and there was no display of feeling whatever. The Litany service in the afternoon was but thinly attended, and met with but little interruption. In the evening there was a numerous attendance. The Rector was present and read the prayers, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Mackonochie. The greatest order prevailed during the whole of the service. There were inside and outside the church some 300 policemen; and there was little or no disturbance.

EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY COMPANY.—The half-yearly meeting of this company was held on Thursday at the London Tavern, for the purpose of receiving the usual report for the past half year, and for the election of directors in the place of those retiring in conformity with the terms of the Act of Parliament. After a long personal discussion, in which the claims of Mr. Love and Mr Godson, the retiring directors, and of Mr. Waddington and Mr. Gamble, the new candidates, were very freely discussed, the meeting agreed to the adoption of the report, which of course carried the dividend of £3 7s. 6d. per cent per annum. The election of directors was then proceeded with. For Mr. Love nearly every hand appeared to be held up, and he was declared by the secretary, who put the motion, to be elected unanimously. Against Mr. Godson there were eight or ten hands held up. The meeting very emphatically declared against Mr. Waddington and Mr. Gamble, neither of whom demanded a poll.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS.—Last week the births of 950 boys and 930 girls—in all 1880 children—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1850-59 the average number was 1706.—In the week that ended last Saturday 1454 deaths were registered in London—757 were the deaths of males, and 697 of females. In the ten years 1850-59 the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week was 1171. The deaths of last week exceeded by 166 the number which the average death-rate would have produced. Smallpox proved fatal in 31 cases; while scarlatina carried off 40 persons, and whooping-cough 40. Diseases of the respiratory organs were the cause of 415 deaths; of these 250 were attributed to bronchitis (which is still on the increase), and 125 to pneumonia. The deaths referred to phthisis, or consumption, were 165. Eight persons died at the age of 90 years and upwards, and among these was a man residing in Goulston-street, Whitechapel, who, it is said, had attained the age of 101.

FIRES.—On Sunday morning a fire broke out on the premises of Bradford's cooperage and stave factory, at Horselydown, which was communicated to above twenty other adjacent buildings, and in a short space of time several thousand pounds' worth of property was laid in ruins.——On Monday morning three fires took place in the metropolitan district. Between six and seven o'clock a fire happened in the premises occupied by Mrs. Emma Jones, Dorset-place, Dorset-square. The firemen were unable to get the flames extinguished until the building and all it contained were nearly destroyed.—A fire happened the same morning on the premises of Mr. Holmes, baker, carrying on business in Northumberland-park, Tottenham, six miles from the nearest brigade engine station. Mr. Holmes's premises were destroyed, and considerable damage was done to those adjoining.—Another fire took place on the premises of Mr. Smith, a chandler, Salisbury-lane, Bermondsey. Conductor Dunk arrived with the Royal Society's escape in the course of a few minutes, but Mr. and Mrs. Smith, with their two children, had previously jumped out of the window, but fortunately they received no personal injury. The premises were consumed and the contents destroyed.——On Wednesday morning fires broke out on the premises of Mr. Bullen, Grafton-yard, Hampstead-road; of Mr. Fitch, New North-road; and in an unoccupied house, Queen's-terrace-grove, South Kensington; and considerable damage was done in each case.

THE PAPER DUTY.—The annual meeting of the Society for Promoting the Repeal of the Taxes on Knowledge was held on Wednesday night at St. Martin's Hall, Long-acre—Mr. Ayrton, M.P., in the chair. The chairman, in opening the proceedings, referred to the success which had already attended the labours of the society, and detailed in historical order the results of the influence which the society had brought to bear upon successive Chancellors of the Exchequer. Dr. Watts, of Manchester, in moving the first resolution, to the effect "that the excise duty on paper obstructs literature and education, impedes commerce, wastes capital, harasses industry, injures the revenue, is capable of collection without violating the law of the land, has been condemned by Parliament, and ought to be repealed forthwith," entered into a long detail of grievances to prove the truth of each of these assertions. The resolution, having been seconded by Mr. Thomas Routledge and supported by Mr. Alderman Fowle, of Oxford, was unanimously agreed to. The meeting was also addressed by Mr. Charles Knight and Professor Key, upon the theme of the prospect of the public press being exempted from all taxation; and a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Milner Gibson and the Chancellor of the Exchequer for their services in bringing about such a state a things. On the motion of Mr. Francis, seconded by Mr. Washington Wilks, a petition to the House of Commons in the spirit of the first resolution was adopted.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.—The fifteenth annual meeting of this institution was held on Tuesday evening in Exeter Hall—the Earl of Shaftesbury in the chair. Both the large hall and the platform were crowded to excess, and amongst the company present was a very large proportion of ladies. The Rev. Dr. M'Crie having offered up a brief prayer, Mr. Shipton, the secretary, read an abstract of the report, which was of a highly-satisfactory nature. The principal fact of interest was the assembling, in July last, of delegates from the various Young Men's Christian Associations throughout the country for conference upon matters of common interest. The committee had joined in deputations to the Government to beg that no encouragement might be given to the opening of public museums and galleries on Sundays. It was gratifying to find that on every occasion the Government had promptly responded to the appeal, and pledged itself to oppose any movement in this direction. Mr. J. Gurney Hoare moved "That a vote of thanks be passed to the president and other officers of the committee, and this meeting pledges itself to sustain by prayer, and, if necessary, by pecuniary support, the important mission of the association to the commercial young men of London." The motion, having been seconded by Mr. W. H. Smith, was carried by acclamation. The Rev. Henry Allen then addressed the meeting, the subject of his discourse being "The strength of young men consecrated to God." The Rev. S. Henry Tarleton followed, taking for his subject "Work and the Workman." Several other gentlemen addressed the meeting.

JAPAN.—Trade has been suspended in Japan by the native authorities, with the approval of the British Consul-General, on account of the grossly-improper conduct of some of the British residents there, and because of outrages committed on Japanese by drunken sailors.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THE Leader of her Majesty's Opposition has never succeeded in gaining any more decided character as a public man than that of a clever party tactician and a skilful manipulator of Parliamentary proceedings. He seems to be in a fair way to forfeit even that reputation. In the absence of Mr. Gladstone on the last evening of last week Mr. Disraeli was tempted by the maladroitness of Lord John Russell, who never could, never did, and never will manage the House of Commons, to put an impromptu notice of motion on the paper, which has resulted in covering him with personal confusion, and leaving his party much in the same condition as the Light Brigade when it returned from the charge at Balaclava. If ever a leader was placed in a ludicrous position, it was when Mr. Du Cane (whose demeanour can only be described by the term "cocky") signified his gracious assent to affording Mr. Disraeli precedence. At that moment his countenance and that of Mr. Gladstone were the subject of a curious study; and when the former rose it was clear that he had already found out his mistake, and that his heart had failed. Anything more meagre as a Parliamentary display, in the sense of its effect on the House, was never witnessed, regard being had to the circumstances. The very attitude Mr. Disraeli assumed was significant. He did not lean broadways on the brass-bound box on the table and shake his handkerchief at the Treasury bench, as his manner is; but he turned away at an angle, and addressed his voice to, and kept his eyes fixed on, the first seat below the gangway, which used to be occupied by Mr. Drummond, whose infinite jests and Yorick-like wit will be heard there no more. This time Mr. Gladstone did not lie back on his seat in that assumed repose which has been his ordinary way of receiving Mr. Disraeli's set speeches; but he leaned over towards him, marking him with his glittering eye, and flourishing a gold pencil-case and a piece of paper about as if he was taking notes, which he did not (the idea of his wanting a note!), and evinced palpably a grim triumph in the fact that the Parliamentary single combat which he thought Mr. Disraeli would have dodged away for a week had fallen into his hands at the very outset. The probabilities are that eulogium of the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has taken every possible shape, in every possible mouth and paper; and, therefore, it will be only necessary to affix to it a characteristic here which is, perhaps, not so generally acknowledged. To a looker-on at that personal contest the oration seemed to indicate downright cruelty; it was merciless; it was like the end of one of those duels of the French stage of which that in "The Corsican Brothers" is a type, in which the victor, having given a mortal thrust to his adversary, draws his sword to and fro in the wound with a refinement of vengeance and a sense of joy in the contemplation of physical agony and mental despair. There was a cheerful barbarity all through the demeanour and style of Mr. Gladstone's address, which was not confined to his immediate foe; as, for instance, when poor, sombre Mr. Newdegate croaked out a dismal ironical cheer, he turned on him, and, in the very spirit of that appreciation of Warwickshire wisdom attributed to Dr. Parr, which we mentioned in our Sketches last week, intimated that some utterly ludicrous assertion which he made would be typical of the wisdom of the House as represented by the lugubrious member in question.

The debate nearly collapsed there, for nobody staid to listen to Sir H. Cairns' gentlemanly fluency, which he accordingly cut short; and, after Sir R. Bethell had inflicted some of his lisping sarcasm on, and Sir F. Kelly had pounded the last drop of patience out of, the lingering audience, the Speaker was about to put the question, when Mr. Ayrton, inspired into bitterness, we suppose, by the non-appearance of that Indian judgeship which persists in not turning up, burst into so palpable an imitation of Mr. Bright's most impassioned style that that gentleman, sitting exactly below him, stared much as Orson must have done when he first beheld his countenance in the mirror-like brightness of the knight's polished shield, and he seemed to think it necessary very soon to neutralise the effect which was caused, by proving that he could on occasion make a dull speech himself. Very remarkable is the evident fraternisation of Lord John Russell and Mr. Gladstone; and, when the former was making one of his haw-haw lumbering speeches, the continued nods of approbation and ready and constant cheers of the latter positively inspired Lord John Russell, and he rose to a point in his address which he has not reached for many a day. Lord Palmerston must, every hour of his present official existence, congratulate himself on his success in inducing Mr. Gladstone to join his Cabinet, for he has not only got the man who has saved and will preserve his Government if any man can, but he has got rid of a most annoying, damaging enemy on his flank. Well, Mr. Horsman, never forgetful of the contemptuous refusal of the Premier to give him a seat in his Cabinet, has taken a similar flanking position, and certainly does contrive to discharge a series of the most offensive missiles that can be concocted in a continuous volley into his now enemy's ranks. He seized on this occasion a happy opportunity, when the hour was late and the House crammed, and as he, in common with every one, felt that the chances of any further exciting debate on the Budget were as good as lost, he, wisely for his own purposes, delivered himself of the speech which he meant for the other and more final discussion. Perhaps Mr. Horsman may not take it ill if we venture to mention an opinion which prevails that, though acids in oratory, as in cookery, give piquancy, yet that continuous draughts of undiluted vinegar are apt to set the teeth on edge.

Many persons have come to the conclusion that the most damaging thing that can happen to the present Ministry is the committing to Lord Palmerston the winding-up of great debates. There has come over the noble Lord a touch of the spirit of 1857, which, happily for him on this occasion, the bitterness and palpable personal animus of Mr. Horsman and the excitement of the House tended to neutralise; but we will venture to assert that, if the feeling and intention of members had been a pin's point less decided, such a style and such a tone as that adopted by the Premier would have lost him many a vote. As it was, the division settled the future for the Budget, and left the House in a condition which poor Mr Du Cane must have keenly appreciated on Tuesday.

The necessity imposed on that gentleman of keeping his oratorical fixed air hard under cork and wire for twenty four hours was of itself a bore; but far greater must have been the mortification when the sound of the popping and fizzing fell on the dulled sense of a reactionary audience. This rising hope of his party is a somewhat pumping orator, with a weak, husky voice, and a jerking gesture, reminding one rather of the present Lord Ripon, supposing his style to be very much watered—an operation which it was not in the least calculated to bear. The House, having nothing better to do, waited very patiently, but awfully tamely, and listened to him without the slightest emotion. Mr. Disraeli, in the discharge of a fostering duty of leadership, turned round in his seat and watched him as he spoke; but even he was wearied out by the undeviating tenacity of a speech which would not have been without its merits if it had been put into forty minutes instead of something near two hours. It was quite within the spirit of the occasion, but still slightly cruel for the Government not to put up an official of their own to answer him, but to let the task fall on an adherent so near to their good graces as the younger brother of Lord Granville must be. The debate which followed must have been conclusive as to the utter discomfiture of the Opposition as an organisation against the Budget for it consisted solely of the pottering of young gentlemen, of whom the oldest, though he looks the youngest, was Sir Stafford Northcote. What its condition actually was may be gathered by the fact that Mr. Ayrton was suffered to wind it up in a speech of an hour and a half, which consisted of a string of loudly-pronounced generalities, and was only to be marked by an idea that it gave rise to, that the prospects of the Indian judgeship had assumed a new phase in his eyes since the night before, for this time he neither abused (quite the contrary) nor declared his intention of voting against the Government.

Among the more general features of the past week which are to be noted we have only space for two. At the close of last week the condition of the Government in the House was such as to lead to a belief that defeat was impending over them. We have already alluded to Mr. Disraeli's fatal success when he sought to separate the consideration of the Treaty with France from that of the Budget which was indorsed by several supporters of the Government, and especially by the chartered mouthpiece of the Whigs, as they at present exist pure and simple, in the form of Lord Harry Vane. It was he who unconsciously led Mr. Disraeli into the trap out of which he has escaped very nearly with the loss of his tail. But positively Lord Palmerston in person was beaten in fact, and would have been discomfited on a division, if he had persisted in taking one, by even such a person as Mr. Pope Hennessy. Yes, it had come to this, and would have come to worse, if Mr. Gladstone had not interposed on Monday.

Could the spirit of the great Sir Robert Peel have looked down on the scene he loved so well it would have shrieked to see the heir of his immediate name doing his best to bring the House of Commons into the position in relation to its great functions as a judge-and-jury society bears to a high court of law. It may minister to a morbid taste for notoriety for a member of Parliament to play a long series of fantastic tricks, and to string together, in an hour's speech delivered to a deliberative assembly, a sequence of jests which would be appropriate to that after-dinner moment at which Sir Robert Walpole used to say it was necessary to introduce a topic on which every man could converse fluently; but we do not envy the situation of a representative of the people who, having for a time extorted rather than excited a sort of mirth under protest from the House of Commons, sits down amidst an ominous silence, and ungreeted by the faintest whisper of a cheer.

THE COURT.

The Queen, accompanied by Princess Louisa, rode on horseback in the riding house of Buckingham Palace on Saturday. The Prince Consort visited the South Kensington Museum. In the evening her Majesty and his Royal Highness honoured the Haymarket Theatre with their presence.

On Sunday the Queen and the Prince Consort, with Princess Alice, Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, Prince Arthur, and the ladies and gentlemen of the Court and the domestic household, attended Divine service in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace. The Rev. F. Garden, Sub-dean of the Chapel Royal, St. James's, preached the sermon.

On Monday the Queen and the Prince Consort, accompanied by Princess Alice, honoured the studio of Mr. Theed, in Drummond-street, with a visit. The Prince Consort presided at a meeting of the governors of Wellington College, held at the Palace of Westminster. In the evening her Majesty and his Royal Highness honoured the Olympic Theatre with their presence. The Prince Arthur and the Princess Louisa honoured Covent-garden Theatre with their presence.

On Tuesday the Queen, accompanied by the Princess Helena, rode on horseback in the riding-house of Buckingham Palace. The Prince Consort went to the South Kensington Museum and presided at a meeting of the council of the Horticultural Society, when Mr. Nesfield explained his plans for the laying out of the new garden at Kensington-gore. In the evening her Majesty and his Royal Highness, accompanied by the Princesses Alice and Helena, honoured Covent-garden Theatre with their presence.

On Wednesday the Queen held a Court and Privy Council at Buckingham Palace. At the former M. Musurus, Turkish Ambassador, had an audience of the Queen, and delivered to her Majesty a letter from the Sultan. At the latter Mr. William Hutt, by command of the Queen, was sworn of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, and declared by the Queen Vice-President of the Board of Trade. Mr. Charles Seely was appointed Sheriff of the county of Southampton, and Mr. Charles F. Thruston was appointed Sheriff of the County of Merioneth. The Royal dinner party in the evening included the Princess Alice, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Newcastle, and Lady Susan Pelham Clinton, the Earl Cawdor, and Sir George and Lady Grey.

On Thursday the Queen held her second Levee this season at St. James's Palace.

Lord De Tabley and the Hon. Mortimer Sackville West have succeeded Lord Camoys and Colonel the Hon. A. Liddell as the Lord and Groom in Waiting to the Queen.

THE LEVEE.

The Queen held a Levee on Thursday at St. James's Palace. Her Majesty and the Prince Consort arrived from Buckingham Palace at two o'clock. The Queen and his Royal Highness shortly afterwards entered the throne-room, attended by the Duchess of Sutherland, Mistress of the Robes; Viscount Sydney, Lord Chamberlain; and the other Lords and Ladies of the Royal household. Her Majesty wore a train of lilac satin trimmed with guipure and lilac gauze ribbon, with petticoat of white satin trimmed to correspond. The headdress was composed of a circle of diamonds. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge attended the Levee. The diplomatic and general circle was very numerously attended. At the Levee Mr. William Atherton, M.P., her Majesty's Solicitor-General, was presented to the Queen by Viscount Palmerston, and received from her Majesty the honour of knighthood. Captain M'Clintock, R.N., late commander of the Fox, Arctic expedition, was also presented, and had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him. The following were among the numerous presentations to her Majesty:—Lord Taunton, on elevation to the Peerage; Mr. Ross Lewis Mangles, on receiving the Victoria Cross; Sir William Dunbar, M.P., on his appointment as Lord of the Treasury; and Viscount Gilford, R.N., on his return from China.

THE PRINCE OF ORANGE.

On Friday the Prince of Orange and suite, who had been staying on a visit with the Duke of Beaufort at Badminton, after paying a visit to Raglan Castle, became the guest of Lord and Lady Llanover, at Llanover, near Abergavenny, where the aristocracy of the principality were invited to meet him, and where a brilliant party assembled yesterday se'nnight to a ball given by Lady Llanover. On Saturday the Prince and suite visited the Crumlin viaduct and the iron-works of Merthyr and Dowlais. On Sunday his Royal Highness attended Divine service at Llanover Church; and on Monday the Prince took his leave of Lord and Lady Llanover, and proceeded with the members of his suite to Hereford, and thence to Chester and Bangor.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge has removed from St. James's Palace to Gloucester House, Park-lane.

His Excellency the Austrian Minister and the Countess d'Apponyi were honoured with the company of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess d'Aumale at dinner on Saturday evening at Chandos House.

The Duke of Northumberland, according to recent letters from Lisbon, has been confined to his hotel in that capital by an attack of gout.

Viscountess Palmerston had an assembly on Saturday evening at her mansion in Piccadilly. The company began to arrive at half-past ten o'clock, and carriages continued to set down up to midnight.

Miss A. Dixon has had the honour of painting miniatures of their Royal Highnesses Princesses Helena, Louisa, and Beatrice.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

Lord Holland's will, which from particular causes has been much delayed, and which has excited the interest of the public, was proved in London, in the principal Registry of the Court of Probate, on Feb. 20. It was executed by his Lordship the day before his death; the greater part was written by his medical attendant, and finished by the British Consul at Naples, who is one of the witnesses thereto, his Lordship having resided in that city for some time. The will runs thus:—He leaves everything "to the will" of Lady Holland. To his Royal Highness the Duke d'Aumale he bequeaths a portrait of Prince Talleyrand; to his Imperial Highness Prince Jerome Bonaparte he bequeaths the portrait of the Emperor Napoleon by Gérard; to his friend Edward Cheney, Esq., he bequeaths his Italian paintings, which he hopes will be worthy of his accceptance; to M. S. Davidson, Esq., £500; to Mrs Smith, of Barfoot, £100; and he bequeaths the following annuities:—To John Latham, Esq., his medical attendant, £800 a year; to his valet, £100 a year; to his butler, £50 a year; to his cook, £60 a year; to his head gardener, £40 a year; and one half-year's wages to all his servants respectively; and appointed Lady Holland, the Earl of Shelburne, and Madgwick Spicer Davidson, Esq., of Spring-gardens, his executors. The personalty was sworn under £50,000.

The late Dr. Todd, eminent alike both as a physician and for medical literary attainments, died suddenly on the 30th of January. He had made his will on the 13th of October, 1856. Is exceedingly brief, and the most intelligible language is employed in its framing; but it was not executed till the following year (on the 27th of December, 1857), when it was attested by W. Conner, M.D., and H. Cooper Todd. It is merely a family disposition; and the personalty, which was sworn under £14,000, is held in trust for the widow during her life, and at her decease is to be equally divided amongst his four children. The executors are the widow of the deceased; the Rev. James Henthorn Todd, D.D., Trinity College, Dublin, the brother; and Robert Cheere, Esq.

The will of John Wynne, Esq., who held a position of some distinction in society, and who died on the 1st of January, 1860, at the College, Shrewsbury, bears date the 11th of December, 1854, and he appointed his nephews, George Jendwine, Esq., and the Rev. William Jendwine, his executors. He has bequeathed his funded property to his said nephews absolutely, and to his three nieces he leaves his plate and furniture. His shares in the Salop Fire Office he leaves to his brother William; in trust for his only child William his residence and estate at Belmont; and all other his real and personal estates he leaves to his three nieces for life, and, after the decease of the last survivor, then to his said nephews.

THE NEW CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF WORKS.

THE Right Hon. W. Cowper, second son of the fifth Earl Cowper, is descended from an ancient family resident in Kent, and subsequently in Hertfordshire, of which the most distinguished members were the poet William Cowper and the Chancellor, who took a leading part in the political transactions of the reigns of Queen Anne and George I. He has represented the borough of Hertford since 1835. The right hon. gentleman has been less heard of in party conflicts than in connection with social questions and domestic legislation. He passed the bill which settled the long-agitated question of medical reform, and brought forward many projects of sanitary legislation. Out of Parliament he has been chiefly known as taking part in philanthropic movements for the improvement of the social condition of the people. He was a leading promoter of the Social Science Association, and delivered addresses at the meetings at Liverpool and Bradford in the capacity of President of the sections on Education and on Public Health. The latter has been published separately for general circulation. He has held successively, in the administrations of Lord J. Russell, the Earl of Aberdeen, and Viscount Palmerston, the offices of Lord of the Admiralty, Under Secretary for the Home Department, President of the Board of Health, Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, and Vice-President of the Board of Trade.

THE RIGHT HON. W. F. COWPER, M.P., CHIEF COMMISSIONER OF WORKS.

THE GRIZZLY BEAR OF THE PRAIRIES.

THE Engraving on page 173—which we owe to the graphic pencil of Mr. Darley, of New York—represents the struggle of a Pawnee Indian with a grizzly bear, an animal that, next to the buffalo, is the most noted and most formidable of the wild creatures that roam over the great prairies of the West. Captain Randolph B. Marcy, of the United States' Army, in his recent admirable little work, "The Prairie Traveller," gives the following interesting information with respect to the manner in which the Indians track the bear over these regions, and to the sport which its pursuit yields to the white sportsmen and pioneers of the wilderness. The readers of Cooper's novels are familiar with the wonderful sagacity of the Indians when on the "trail," either in war or in hunting. Captain Marcy corroborates these details by his own experience:—"I remember upon one occasion," he says, "as I was riding with a Delaware upon the prairies, we crossed the trail of a large party of Indians travelling with lodges. The tracks appeared to me quite fresh, and I remarked to the Indian that we must be near the party. 'Oh no,' said he; 'the trail was made two days before in the morning,' at the same time pointing with his finger to where the sun would be at about eight o'clock. Then, seeing that my curiosity was excited to know by what means he arrived at this conclusion, he called my attention to the fact that there had been no dew for the last two nights, but that on the previous morning it had been heavy. He then pointed out to me some spears of grass that had been pressed down into the earth by the horses' hoofs, upon which the sand still adhered, having dried, and thus clearly showing that the grass was wet when the tracks were made. At another time, as I was travelling with the same Indian, I discovered upon the ground what I took to be a bear-track, with a distinctly-marked impression of the heel and all the toes. I immediately called the Indian's attention to it, at the same time flattering myself that I had made quite an important discovery which had escaped his observation. The fellow remarked, with a smile, 'Oh no, Captain, may be so be not bear-track.' He then pointed with his gun-rod to some spears of grass that grew near the impression, but I did not comprehend the mystery until he dismounted and explained to me that, when the wind was blowing, the spears of grass would be bent over towards the ground and the oscillating motion thereby produced would scoop out the loose sand into the shape I have described. The truth of this explanation was apparent, yet it occurred to me that its solution would have baffled the wits of most white men."

The grizzly bear is not a pleasant customer either to fall in with or to fall out with, though Captain Marcy speaks more contemptously of him than some other travellers. Besides the common black bear of the Eastern States, several others are found in the mountains of California, Oregon, Utah, and New Mexico—viz., the grizzly, brown, and cinnamon varieties. All have nearly the same habits, and are hunted in the same manner. "From all I had heard of the grizzly bear," says Captain Marcy, "I was induced to believe him one of the most formidable and savage animals in the universe; and that the man who would deliberately encounter and kill one of these beasts had performed a signal feat of courage, which entitled him to a lofty position among the votaries of Nimrod. So firmly had I become impressed with this conviction that I should have been very reluctant to fire upon one had I met him when alone and on foot. The grizzly bear is assuredly the monarch of the American forests, and, so far as physical strength is concerned, he is, perhaps, without a rival in the world; but, after some experience in hunting, my opinions regarding his courage and his willingness to attack men have very materially changed.

"In passing over the elevated forks of the Platte River, in 1858, I encountered a full-grown female grizzly bear, with two cubs, very quietly reposing upon the open prairie, several miles distant from any timber. This being the first opportunity that had ever occurred to me for an encounter with the ursine monster, and being imbued with the most exalted notions of the beast's proclivities for offensive warfare, especially when in the presence of her offspring, it may very justly be imagined that I was rather more excited than usual. I, however, determined to make the assault. I felt the utmost confidence in my horse, as it was afraid of nothing; and, after arranging everything about my saddle and arms in good order, I advanced to within about eighty yards before I was discovered by the bear, when she raised herself upon her haunches and gave me a scrutinising examination. I seized this opportune moment to fire, but missed my aim, and she started off, followed by her cubs at their utmost speed. After loading again, I gave the spurs to my horse and resumed the chase, soon passing the cubs, who were making the most plaintive cries of distress. They were heard by the dam, but she gave no other heed to them than occasionally to halt for an instant, turn around, sit up on her posteriors, and give a hasty look back; but as soon as she saw me following her she invariably turned again and redoubled her speed. I pursued about four miles, and fired four balls into her before I succeeded in bringing her to the ground, and from the time I first saw her until her death-wound, notwithstanding I was often very close upon her heels, she never came to bay or made the slightest demonstration of resistance. Her sole purpose seemed to be to make her escape, leaving her cubs in the most cowardly manner.

"Upon three other different occasions I met the mountain bears, and once the cinnamon species, which is called the most formidable of all, and in none of these instances did they exhibit the slightest indication of anger or resistance, but invariably ran from me. Such is my experience with this formidable monarch of the plains and mountains. It is possible that a man can suddenly upon the beast in a thicket, where it would have no previous warning, be might be attacked; but it is my opinion that if the bear gets the wind or sight of a man at any considerable distance it will endeavour to get away as soon as possible. I am so fully impressed with this idea that I shall hereafter hunt bears with a feeling of as much security as I would have in hunting the buffalo.

The grizzly, like the black, bear hybernates in winter, and makes his appearance in the spring with his claws grown out long and very soft and tender; he is then poor, and unfit for food. I was told by an old Delaware Indian that, when the bear has been travelling against the wind, and wishes to lie down, he always turns in an opposite direction, and goes some distance before making his bed. The same Indian mentioned that, when a bear had been pursued, and sought shelter in a cave, he had often endeavoured to eject him with smoke, but that the bear would advance to the mouth of the cave, where the fire was burning, and put it out with his paws, then retreat into the cave again. This would indicate that there is endowed with some glimpses of reason beyond the ordinary instinct of the brute creation in grizzly bear, indeed, is capable of discerning the connection between cause and effect. Notwithstanding the extraordinary instinct of which he is capable, this animal exhibits upon some occasions, upon others he shows himself to be one of the most stupid animals imaginable. For example, when he has taken possession of a cavern, and the courageous hunter enters with a torch and rifle, he is said he will, instead of forcibly ejecting the intruder, make himself small as possible, and cover his eyes with his paws, so as to exclude the light; apparently thinking that in this situation he cannot be seen. The hunter can then approach as close as he pleases and shoot him down."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The Treaty with France was further discussed when it was understood by the Government that the proposed reduction and abolition of import duties, pursuant to certain Articles of the Commercial Treaty, were to take effect as regards the produce of other countries than France and her colonies only. In virtue of the obligations of the most favoured nation clause. Mr. Cornewall Lewis said that the treaty with France had no effect upon the treaty with Prussia, which was a separate convention, and which he did not think fit to touch during the negotiations of other countries they would not be justified in making the concessions to France.

Public Improvements Bill.—On the motion for going into Committee on this bill, Mr. Ayrton objected to the principle of the bill, which was to raise rates for places of public resort or amusement, which was much the same as taking the Sunday out of church rates, which he thought objectionable. For example, when he has taken possession of a cavern, and the courageous hunter enters with a torch and rifle, he is said he will, instead of forcibly ejecting the intruder, make himself small as possible, and cover his eyes with his paws, so as to exclude the light; apparently thinking that in this situation he cannot be seen. The hunter can then approach as close as he pleases and shoot him down."

Mr. Bernal Osborne thought that the principle of the bill was an inordinate animation of despotic Governments. That hon. gentleman had before now expressed great admiration of the French despotic Government, and had always been foremost in supporting the Emperor of the French. As regarded the Treaty of Commerce, it was a most extravagant idea to suppose that the Emperor of the French would not be actuated by the highest degree, and the imposition of a double income tax as a penalty on Treaty had no obvious precedent. The whole question was then proceeded to analyse the commercial treaty, and maintained that all the evidence in favour of the treaty was ex parte evidence.

Mr. Cardwell vindicated the financial propositions of the Government which, however, were favourable in the abstract, would, he believed, open up new sources of trade and industry, which would very soon more than balance the present expenditure of the country.

On the motion of Mr. Newdegate the debate was adjourned.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. Gladstone has addressed an explanatory letter to "The Committee of Importers and others," who had forwarded to him remonstrances against the proposed duties on the importation of paper, paper-hangings, and warehouse, and against the stamp proposed upon deeds, covenants and warrants to sell. Mr. Gladstone says that he is aware that all new taxations may require to be modified; but the details of the modifications must be left to the Committee of Ways and Means, which will deal with the larger and more vital questions involved in the scheme for the remission of taxation. Mr. Gladstone says that the Government has not hesitated further admits that many of the proposed warehousing charges are too high, and that the experience of the past year has suggested to him an alternative proposal, urged by a deputation from Liverpool, that all goods should be allowed to be warehoused without any charge for rent. Such warrants are "not intended to be liable to those frequent renewals which attend the transfer of goods from hand to hand, with regard to contract notes, bills of parcels are not contemplated in the new taxation. Mr. Gladstone recommends that the Stamp Office should act upon the suggestions of the representations of the commercial community, and instructions to that effect will be given. Mr. Gladstone has already digested system of remissions of and additions to taxations; but it is their intention to give the country the benefits of the new Treaty before they entertain advantageously with that imported into some of the mercantile discussions of the present session.

Meetings of the different trades affected by the Budget have been held in all the principal towns, and in London the commerce have, since Saturday last, been mostly vetoed in favour of the Ministerial measure. Mr. Gladstone has had a numerous deputation from the cotton districts, and from the silk districts, the Irish and Scotch distillers, the licensed victuallers, the tea dealers, the wine merchants, the grocers, the French silk manufacturers and traders of Bristol, Hull, Newcastle, Cork, Greenock, and other towns. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has received them all, and has assured them that the Government will not be induced to lower its duties upon English silk goods above the rate already proposed.

Ireland Bankers.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to Major S. Hayes, said that the Government had no intention to propose any fresh issues of notes and paper to be bonded in Ireland towers. Neither was it their intention to increase the number of the banks of issue, which were now limited by the 6 and 7 Victoria.

Duke Lechmere.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to Mr. Wyld, said the much-vexed question of beer licensing would be left to be dealt with in a future session, as the Government had enough on their hands to be taken into consideration.

Prince of Wales's Revenues.—Mr. S. Herbert, in answer to Sir H. Stracey, said it was the intention of the Government to lower the prince of Wales's revenues from the Duchy of Cornwall to £40,000 a year, and there was no alteration in the pay of either force from what it was at present.

Dublin Corporation Bill.—Mr. Cogan, in reply to Mr. Jones, said that the Government had received information as to the amount of the Dublin private bill, and that it was very much larger than was anticipated.

The Income Tax.—The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in reply to Mr. R. B. Sheridan, said that he would continue to levy the income tax here before. Incomes under £100 would, therefore, of course be exempted.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY AND COMMERCIAL TREATY.

Mr. Hubbard opened the adjourned debate. He said he could not congratulate the country upon the benefits it had derived from the treaty. Mr. Cobden had not been appointed by the Queen to represent the views of the French had shown himself a very apt pupil; but this country would have to pay a bill ordered by the Emperor and Mr. Cobden to be executed by an free trade to the Emperor Napoleon. If our Plenipotentiary had exerted himself to get the best terms for this country he might have succeeded to a certain extent, but would have been a real benefit to the country, and we might then have been able to dispense with the income tax of £10,000,000 sterling. He deprecated both the continuance of the income tax and the machinery by which it had to be carried into execution. It was a most unpopular tax, because it was not only unequal in its operation as between class and class, but also as between individuals of the same class.

Mr. E. Baxter said the treaty with France had been accepted and approved of by the leading commercial men of this country. He did not think although England has gone further in her principles of free trade than France, that she had gained so much, nor had she displayed so much her established right to the extent that France had (Hear). He regarded the Treaty and the Budget as supplementary to each other, and as carrying out free trade, and promising great prosperity to the country as the result of these operations.

Mr. Hubbard, in explanation, said he thinks that they were taking the people at large to purchase free trade for the benefit of a few manufacturers. He was far from this House was a species of protection that was most unjust. He did not envy the income of a manufacturer compared with that of a poor man, and not even the revolution of his bed, number for fewer.

Mr. Mason opposed the motion, and expressed his conviction that the advantages to be derived from the treaty, the greatest of which was that, in the course of a short time, would be the abolition of the income tax.

Lord Stanley of Alderley objected to the treaty because it did not retain in the hands of the Government the power of exporting corn during a season of war, and also because it made no provision with regard to shipping. He had been always in favour of a repeal of the paper duty, but he thought that it was a most inopportune time to propose that measure, when there was no prospect of a surplus. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had repealed that duty, and equalised the duty on spirits to 10s., a corresponding income tax would have been sufficient. He thought the penny stamp on papers an impolitic measure. Notwithstanding his objections, he could not support a motion which tended to prevent the passing of a measure that would close the tariff of a host of duties, and, by removing the shackles from trade, would materially increase the prosperity of the country.

Mr. Evans cordially supported the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, especially with regard to the commercial treaty, the principle of which he hoped to see adopted by other countries as well as France. His approval of the treaty was not as a permanent source of revenue, although it was unequal in its pressure, and required readjustment.

Sir F. Baring defended the general principle of commercial treaties, but contended that endeavours should be made to get from other countries the same concessions that we had obtained from France, inasmuch as the concessions on our side were made, not to please merely the Emperor of the French or his office of Minister, but would be to diminish the charges for those of France. He concluded by warning the Government against leaving to us a deficiency as £11,000,000 or £12,000,000 to be dealt with by a new Reformed Parliament.

Mr. Horsfall gave his warmest support to the financial scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and reminded the House of a speech he had made last year, in which he urged the necessity of extending intercourse with France whereby those obstacles to the trading intercourse of the two countries would be removed, and he could not consider the offer of £100,000,000 customers for her produce. Soon after that speech, negotiations were set on foot by the then leading commissioner of France—Mr. Cobden and himself in reference to the propositions the result of which was the treaty now before them, which he considered one of the best measures which had ever been effected for the benefit of both countries.

Mr. Whitbread opposed the treaty, which he considered as an

Mr. Gladstone then replied. He said he could not congratulate the country upon the benefits it had derived from the treaty. Mr. Cobden had not been appointed by the Queen to represent the views of the French had shown himself a very apt pupil; but this country would have to pay a bill ordered by the Emperor and Mr. Cobden to be executed as free trade to the Emperor Napoleon. If our Plenipotentiary had exerted himself to get the best terms for this country he might have succeeded to a certain extent, but would have been a real benefit to the country, and we might then have been able to dispense with the income tax of £10,000,000 sterling. He deprecated both the continuance of the income tax and the machinery by which it had to be carried into execution. It was a most unpopular tax, because it was not only unequal in its operation as between class and class, but also as between individuals of the same class.

Mr. E. Baxter said the treaty with France had been accepted and approved of by the leading commercial men of this country. He did not think although England has gone further in her principles of free trade than France had, that she had gained so much, nor had she displayed so much her established right to the extent that France had (Hear). He regarded the Treaty and the Budget as supplementary to each other, and as carrying out free trade, and promising great prosperity to the country as the result of these operations.

Mr. Hubbard, in explanation, said he thinks that they were taking the people at large to purchase free trade for the benefit of a few manufacturers. He was far from this House was a species of protection that was most unjust. He did not envy the income of a manufacturer compared with that of a poor man, and not even the revolution of his bed, number for fewer.

Mr. Mason opposed the motion, and expressed his conviction that the advantages to be derived from the treaty, the greatest of which was that, in the course of a short time, would be the abolition of the income tax.

Lord Stanley of Alderley objected to the treaty because it did not retain in the hands of the Government the power of exporting corn during a season of war, and also because it made no provision with regard to shipping. He had been always in favour of a repeal of the paper duty, but he thought that at present was a most inopportune time to propose that measure, when there was no prospect of a surplus. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had repealed that duty, and equalised the duty on spirits to 10s., a corresponding income tax would have been sufficient. He thought the penny stamp on papers an impolitic measure. Notwithstanding his objections, he could not support a motion which tended to prevent the passing of a measure that would close the tariff of a host of duties, and, by removing the shackles from trade, would materially increase the prosperity of the country.

Mr. Evans cordially supported the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, especially with regard to the commercial treaty, the principle of which he hoped to see adopted by other countries as well as France. His approval of the treaty was not as a permanent source of revenue, although it was unequal in its pressure, and required readjustment.

Sir F. Baring defended the general principle of commercial treaties, but contended that endeavours should be made to get from other countries the same concessions that we had obtained from France, inasmuch as the concessions on our side were made, not to please merely the Emperor of the French or his office of Minister, but would be to diminish the charges for those of France. He concluded by warning the Government against leaving to us a deficiency as £11,000,000 or £12,000,000 to be dealt with by a new Reformed Parliament.

Mr. Horsfall gave his warmest support to the financial scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and reminded the House of a speech he had made last year, in which he urged the necessity of extending intercourse with France whereby those obstacles to the trading intercourse of the two countries would be removed, and he could not consider the offer of £100,000,000 customers for her produce. Soon after that speech, negotiations were set on foot by the then leading commissioner of France—Mr. Cobden and himself in reference to the propositions the result of which was the treaty now before them, which he considered one of the best measures which had ever been effected for the benefit of both countries.

Mr. Whitbread opposed the treaty, which he considered as an inordinate animation of despotic Governments. That hon. gentleman had before now expressed great admiration of the French despotic Government, and had always been foremost in supporting the Emperor of the French. As regarded the Treaty of Commerce, it was a most extravagant idea to suppose that the Emperor of the French would not be actuated by the highest degree, and the imposition of a double income tax as a penalty on Treaty had no obvious precedent. The whole question was then proceeded to analyse the commercial treaty, and maintained that all the evidence in favour of the treaty was ex parte evidence.

Mr. Cardwell vindicated the financial propositions of the Government which, however, were favourable in the abstract, would, he believed, open up new sources of trade and industry, which would very soon more than balance the present expenditure of the country.

On the motion of Mr. Newdegate the debate was adjourned.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Thit front completely extinguished all prospect of racing at Lincoln last week, and there was nothing for the great mass of trainers and horses but to wait patiently till the end of Tuesday. The chances of sport at Nottingham were also very dubious till the sun shone out at last, and Captain Christie, one of the stewards, pronounced the naturally fishy surface of the course sufficiently safe for business. Upwards of seventy horses had arrived, and nearly forty of these were stripped on the Tuesday, so that the 1860 season opened merrily enough. Cruiser's grey son, Rattleboro, made very short work of the Trial Stakes for Two Year Old; and Mr. Golding's stable, with H. Grimshaw in the saddle, scored the other three races with success. The Spring Handicap was won by Wallaco, who had been "a hot favourite" for the Two Thousand and Confusion, a remarkably marked son of Newminster, and the winner of the Champagne at Rugby, added another victory to the already large winnings of the stock of the Rawcliffe crack. This colt won again on Wednesday; and Lord Zetland's mare, Lady Golightly, was the first of twelve that ran for the Little John Stakes; Zodiac, by Orlando, being second. His Lordship's filly will be remembered as the winner of the Yearling Stakes at Shrewsbury last September.

The Cheltenham Club on Tuesday, and Lincoln on Wednesday and Thursday (we believe), are the meetings before the next week.

John Day, junior, has lost his landlord and steady supporter in John Shirley Baker Mill, of Mottistont, near Romsey. He once kept a pack of foxhounds, and was a fair rider to them, as those who knew Danebury. He bought Cymbi, the winner of the Oaks, in 1845, and bred a fair horse in Cymbi, but his racing was on a very quiet scale. He was originally in the Church, and died in his fifty-sixth year.

The racing world, which is uncommonly fond, as in duty bound, of a fray, was delighted at the gratified yesterday at Guildhall by the case of Barry v. Shipley. It seems that the plaintiff, who declares that he is a Captain in the Scots Greys, and white others, who profess to have his pedigree by heart, stoutly maintain that he was a drummer boy in the 9th or 12th Lubies till he was sweetpea, and has lived on his wits in England ever since, had devised "the best robbery out," in the shape of a Turf Purification Society to "put down" pot-house racing at a guinea a year, and have the privilege of inspecting photographs of Wisbech and debauched Doncaster. The defendant, the Sporting Life attacked him and his scheme in the most uncompromising terms, and not only denounced him as a card-sharper, but stated that he had been strongly suspected of arson as a Nottinghamshire bankrupt. An action for libel was accordingly brought, and the defendants, holding a plea of justification on the records, had proved it to the satisfaction of the jury, and won their verdict.

Lord Derby's desire to prevent any one from winning the Derby, starting a horse for a race unless he carries 7st., under pain of forfeiting £200, has met with a qualified approval from the racing world, and they are beginning to see how far the present and ex Premiers will deal with it. Had his Lordship said 6st. there would not have been a dissentient voice as to its propriety, but Jockey Club have done quite as much as the private handicappers to favour this wretched system, as they do not scruple to handicap so low as 6st. 7lb.

Greek Fire, Billet Doux, Sally (the winner last year, who was drawn against Salamander), and Maidolina, were bought in their first courses for the Waterloo Cup; and the result of the first ties was as follows:—Mr. Gibson's Snipsy, Hardy's best Steady Heart, Sampler beat Penrith, Dread Nothing beat Kingston, Wildflower beat Daylight, Cardinal York beat Pompey-a-line, Skittles beat Perfection, Fly-a-line beat Fancy Free, Mr. Lee Barber's Lucy Lockett beat Lancewood beat Wilberforce, Maid of the Mill beat Scrauger, and Eldridge beat Carnation. The latter four contestants this morning has been great havoc among the presumed cracks, both Scotch and English.

The friends of the South Berks Hunt, who were exceedingly sorry to receive the late master's resignation, praise the acceptance of the office on a gentleman master, Mr. Pusey, but he declined it. There is the greatest anxiety among the gentry and farmers to have the country well hunted, and £1,000 was subscribed at the meeting on Saturday last. This, of course, does not include the subscriptions of those absent, and other minor contributions to the earth-stopping fund. It is to be hoped that the experiment will be successful in their search. What says Mr. Percy Williams?

THE Profit for 1860 of the Championship.—A strong feeling has been manifested in the Isle of Wight that the forthcoming prize fight for what is termed "the championship of England." At the recent meeting of the Isle of Wight Rifle Club, the oldest constitutional institution of the magistrates to the subject, with a view to their taking steps to prevent the pugilistic exhibition. A resolution to that effect was accordingly addressed to the directors of the Eastern Counties Railway, requesting them to refuse to grant the use of their line for the conveyance of the party, in defiling a special train for the purpose of taking down the combatants and their associates. We are happy to say that this step has been received by upon this judicious suggestion, and we trust that the directors of every line, refuse to encourage such a breach of the peace, will adopt the same course, or in any way aid in carrying out the objects of the promoters of these brutal and demoralising exhibitions.

The house of Michael Angelo at Florence, which is filled with works of art, has become the property of that city, by the bequest of Signor Buonarotti, one of the great sculptor's descendants. As soon opportunity was made by Signor Buonarotti's heirs, the Tuscan Government settled the matter by paying down 4000 scudi. It is stated that among the bequests there become public property are several unpublished works by M. Angelo in prose and verse, and a number of interesting relics of the illustrious contemporaries.

The Paris correspondents of some of the German journals state that Mr. Cobden declined the cross of the Legion of Honour when offered to him by the Emperor as an acknowledgment of his co-operation in negotiating the treaty of commerce.

MUSIC.

The management of the Royal English Opera have of late been reverting to some of the older articles of their répertoire—"The Rose of Castille," "The Crown Diamonds," the "Sonnambula," and one or two others—thus producing a variety of entertainment, which has proved very attractive. "Dinorah" was given one evening this week by command of her Majesty. People have been surprised that this most beautiful opera, after so successful a production, should have been withdrawn so soon from the bills. This arose, however, from no slackening of its run, but (as we understand) from an arrangement with Mr. Gye—natural under the circumstances—that its attraction should not be too much exhausted before its reproduction in its Italian dress. Mr. Vincent Wallace's "Lurline" was performed for the first time on Thursday, with complete and well deserved success. Next week we shall give some account of the opera and of its production.

The New Philharmonic Concerts commenced for the season at St. James's Hall on Monday evening, under the direction of Dr. Wylde, by whom they are now carried on. The concert of Monday was an excellent entertainment. Dr. Wylde has formed a first-rate orchestra, conducted by himself, with Mr. Henry Blagrove as principal violin, and including many of our most eminent instrumentalists. The chief feature of the concert was Beethoven's sympony in B flat, one of the greatest of his works, performed in a manner that did high honour to the orchestra and their conductor, who wielded his bâton with great firmness and judgment. Mozart's pianoforte concerto in G minor was admirably played by Mdlle. Marie Wieck, the sister of the celebrated Clara Schumann, and akin to her in talent as well as in blood. Mr. Henry Blagrave performed one of the finest concertos (that in E minor) of Spohr, his illustrious master, with a beauty of tone, brilliancy of execution, and grace and purity of style, which none of the foreign lions of the day could have excelled. "A prophet," they say, "is not honoured in his own country," and, though this adage cannot be applied literally to Mr. Blagrove, yet he is too often made to give place to foreign violinists not equal to himself. Piatti played Bach's "Saraband and Gavotte," displaying his incomparable command of the violoncello. The singers were Madame Rudersdorff and Mdlle. Parepa. The Hall was crowded, and the performances, both instrumental and vocal, were greatly applauded.

The Madrigal Society had its one hundred and nineteenth anniversary festival, at Freemasons' Hall, on Thursday last week. Sir George Clerk, the president of the society, was in the chair, and there was a large assemblage of members and visitors. The music of the evening was an admirable selection of madrigals, consisting of fine specimens of Wilbye, Weelkes, Morley, Morenzio, and other great English and Italian masters of the eighteenth and seventeenth centuries, sung, as usual, con amore, and consequently well. This excellent society enjoys a green old age. It is independent of the influence of transitory tastes and fashions; and, long as it has lived, there is every probability that it may live as long again.

The London Glee and Madrigal Union completed, on Saturday morning their series of performances at the Dudley Gallery, Egyptian Hall. This series has continued for seven weeks, during which time the performances (given twice a day) have been constantly attended by crowded audiences. Having already fully described these performances, it is sufficient at present to say that they are to be resumed at the same place on Monday next, and to be continued for a fortnight. Later in the season, we believe, the society will return to the Hanover-square Rooms, where, last season, they gave the concerts which first made them known to the public.

THE THEATRES, &c.

St. James's.—A new little drama of touching interest was produced on Saturday, entitled "First Affections;" which are shown to be sometimes evanescent. The heroine (Miss Wyndham), on becoming a widow, writes to her lover, who has been some time abroad in a military capacity, that she remembers her earliest pledges, and would be happy now to give him the hand of which circumstances had previously deprived him. He hastens to accept her offer; but his altered and hirsute appearance displease her, and she would fain find refuge in the arms of a smooth barrister who has long courted the lady; while the bluff soldier, who has formed a new attachment, is only too glad to pair off with her sister. The little piece is very nicely played, and has proved deservedly successful.

New Adelphi.—"Still Waters Run Deep" was revived on Monday. Mr. and Mrs. A. Wigan supported their usual characters, and secured the approbation of a fashionable and numerous audience.

Surrey.—A new drama has been produced at this theatre. It is in three acts, and is called "Cause and Effect." Of the plot it would be sheer folly to attempt an analysis. It is sufficient to say that it consists wholly of melodramatic situations, with just sufficient dialogue to introduce each member of the terrible series. Such a drama we have not witnessed for years, and hope many may again elapse before we witness another. Mr. Shepherd, as Manteuffel, the homicide, worked hard to sustain a part which is of the Robert Macaire school, and demands incessant vigour. The character is amusing in its atrocity, and is relieved by being contrasted with that of a dancing-girl and domestic, named Estelle, which Miss Sarah Thorne enacts with much cleverness and spirit. The parties to the plot are involved in all manner of complexities, and are all at cross purposes, the lady running off with the wrong gentleman, and the right one being shot through a door in the King's name, being mistaken for the murderer Manteuffel, and thus killed instead of him. Nevertheless, in the height of his triumph, the assassin is betrayed into the toils by Estelle. The piece was well placed on the stage, with scenery and accessories of considerable beauty. It was followed by the performance of the three-act abridgment from Shakspeare's comedy called "Katherine and Petruchio." The characters were both powerfully supported. Miss Heraud and Mr. Creswick contrived to excite the crowded audience to boundless merriment, and, on appearing before the curtain, received a well-merited ovation.

Mr. Charles Mackay—whose new poem, in seven cantos, "A Man's Heart," in announced for publication this week—has been lecturing recently at Oxford and Kingston upon "Poetry and Song." He delivered the same lecture on Thursday evening last at the Islington Literary and Scientific Institute.

An Amateur Performance of the Savage Club, for a benevolent purpose, will take place on the 7th of March next. The first piece will be "The School for Scandal," in which Mr. Frank Talfourd will play Sir Peter Teazle, and Mr. Byron Charles Surface. The female characters will be professionally supported—Miss Sedgwick playing Lady Teazle, and Mrs. Weston Mrs. Candour. A burlesque of "The Forty Thieves" will be the concluding piece.

Royal General Theatrical Fund.—On Wednesday the annual meeting of the members of the Royal General Theatrical Fund was held in the saloon of the Lyceum Theatre—Mr. Buckstone in the chair. It appeared from the statement of the secretary, Mr. Cullenford, that the total income of the society for the past year amounted to £1382 15s. 7d. With respect to outlay, the committee had bestowed a donation of £250 to the funds of the Royal Dramatic College, one of £50 to a lady—a former dramatic celebrity—and one of £3 to another. They had also paid the funeral expenses of two other ladies, and added the sum of £625 3s. 0½d. to the annuity fund. The report having been received and adopted, the committee of management was appointed for the ensuing year, and other business transacted.

Dramatic Sick Fund Association.—The fourth anniversary of the Dramatic, Equestrian, and Musical Sick Fund Association was held on Wednesday evening at Willis's Rooms—Mr. Thackeray in the chair. The chairman, in proposing "Prosperity to the Association," called upon the members of the profession to help each other. They must not depend on "swells," but must help each other. Every man, from "Hamlet" down to the sawduster in the equestrian ring, ought to lay by for a rainy day, and for old age, which would inevitably come. The secretary, in reading the report, said that the association had £1004 at the bank. He then read the subscription list, the more prominent items being the following:—Miss Amy Sedgwick, £10 10s; W. B. Parker, Esq., M.D., £10 10s.; Mr. Thackeray, £5 5s.; Miss Swanborough, £5 5s.; Messrs. Robson and Emden, £5 5s.; Mr. Albert Smith, £5 5s.; Mr. Defries, £5 5s.; Messrs. Johnson, £5 5s.; Mrs. Charles Young, £5; Mr. W. H. Swanborough, £3 3s.

A Real Shakspearean Discovery.—It is a curious coincidence that, at the very moment when the literary world is shocked by the exposure of an unparalleled series of fabrications in connection with the life and times of Shakspeare, some legal documents of unimpeachable authenticity relating to the poet's family and property have been brought to light. The precise nature and interest of these papers we are not in a position to unfold. All that we at present know is that such documents have been discovered during the recent repairs of the Rolls Chapel, and that, by direction of the Right Hon. the Master of the Rolls, the duty of making them public has been intrusted to Mr. Staunton, who is well known to be now engaged on an edition of Shakspeare's works.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The result of the division in the House of Commons on Monday night, and increased ease in the money market, have produced comparative activity in Stock Exchange circles. There has been an increased demand for Home Securities, in which steady investments have been made on account of the public, and prices have had an upward tendency.

Although a few parcels of gold have been withdrawn from the Bank of England for export purposes, it appears to be the general impression that money has seen its highest range for the present. The supply on offer for discount purposes is very large; bill-brokers and others are taking long-dated paper with more freedom; and most of the Continental exchanges show very little profit on shipments of gold. In Lombard-street short first-class paper has been discounted at 3¾ ⅞; three months', at 3⅞ to 4; four months', at 4 to 4½; and six months', at 3¾ to 5¼ per cent.

Advices from Bombay state that the supply of gold had considerably increased, both from this country and Australia, and, further, that it had fallen to a nominal amount; hence the next packet is expected to carry out very little bullion. The last steamer took out £224,392, of which £20,905 was in gold, the rest in silver. The Indian Council have drawn no bills upon either Presidency. The value of the gold known to be on passage to this country is £410,000. Bar silver has sold slowly, at reduced rates—the last quotation being 62d. per ounce standard.

We understand that the amount to be invested next month in the purchase and extinction of the Anglo-Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cent Bonds is £127,000.

At a meeting of the Oriental Inland Steam Company it was admitted that the attempt to navigate the steam-trains on the Ganges, arising, we presume, from the want of adequate steam power, has proved nearly a failure.

The report of the directors of the Berlin Waterworks Company states that the profits last half year were £1215, against £249 in the previous six months.

English Securities were steady in price on Monday, but the dealings in them were by no means numerous. Bank Stock sold at 230. The Reduced Three per Cents realised 95; Consols, for Money, 94¾ ⅞; Ditto, for Account, 94¾ ⅞; New Three per Cents, 94⅞ 95; India Five per Cents, 103¾ ⅞; Ditto Debentures, 1858, 97½ ⅝; Ditto, 1859, 97⅝ ½ ⅛; Ditto, Bonds, 5s. prem. to par.; Exchequer Bills, 23s. to 26s. prem. India Enfaced Paper, Five per Cent, was 97½ ⅝. Prices were somewhat on the advance on the following day, and the market was very firm. Consols, for Transfer, touched 94⅝ ⅞; Ditto, for Account, 94⅞; the Reduced and New Three per Cents, 95⅛; Long Annuities, 1885, 17⅜; India Five per Cents, 103¾ ⅝; Ditto, Debentures, 1859, 97½ ⅝; Ditto, Bonds, 4s. prem.; Exchequer Bills, 24s. to 27s. prem. Bank Stock realised 230 to 231; India Enfaced Paper, Five per Cent, 98; Ditto, Five-and-a-half per Cent, 102¾. A further rise took place in the quotations on Wednesday:—Bank Stock marked 231 to 230; Reduced Three per Cents, 95¼; Consols, for Money, 95⅛ ¼; Ditto, for Time, 95⅛ ¼; New Three per Cents, 95⅜ ¼ ½; India Five per Cents, 104¼; Ditto Four per Cent Enfaced Paper, 83; Ditto Five per Cent, 98½ ⅜; Ditto Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104 103¾; Ditto Debentures, 1858, 97⅝; Ditto, 1859, 97½ ¼; Ditto Bonds, par; Exchequer Bills, 24s. to 27s. prem. The market was very quiet on Thursday; prices, however, were firm:—Consols were done at 95 to 95⅛; the Reduced and the New Three per Cents, 95¼ ⅛; Long Annuities, 17⅛; India Five per Cents, 104⅛ ¼; Ditto Debentures, 97⅝ ⅜; and Exchequer Bills, 24s. to 27s. prem. India Five per Cent Enfaced Paper was 98⅜; Ditto Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104.

The dividend of the Southampton Dock Company is 2 per cent for the past half year.

Shares in the new projects have been in but limited request. Ocean Marine have sold at 2⅜ ½ prem.; Universal, ½ ⅝ prem.; London and Provincial Marine, 3-16 to 5-16 prem.; Bank of Turkey, ⅝ ½ dis.; and City of London Brewery, Preference, ⅝ to ⅞ prem. The scrip of the New Canadian Loan has been quoted at 2⅛ ⅜ prem.

An increased amount of speculative business has been transacted in Turkish Bonds, both old and new, and prices have somewhat improved. All other Foreign Securities have ruled steady, at about previous quotations. The leading currencies during the week are as follows:—Brazilian Five per Cents, 102¾; Brazilian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 1858, 94; Ditto, 1852, 94; Buenos Ayres Six per Cents, Deferred, 21⅜; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 95½; Mexican Three per Cents, 21⅛; Sardinian Five per Cents, 85½; Spanish Three per Cents, 45; Ditto, Passive, 12; Turkish Six per Cents, 79½; Ditto, New, 66¾; Turkish Four per Cents, 101¾; Belgian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 98½; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 66¼; Dutch Four per Cents, 102.

The market for Joint-stock Bank Shares has been moderately active, and prices have continued firm. Australasia have realised 80; Bank of Egypt, 24½; Bank of Turkey, 2⅜; British North American, 58½; Chartered of India, Australia, and China, 21; English, Scottish, and Australian Chartered, 16½; London Chartered of Australia, 22¾; London and County, 33; London Joint-stock, 31½; London and Westminster, 55¾; New South Wales, 52½; Ottoman, 19¾; South Australia, 29⅝; and Union of Australia, 46.

Colonial Government Securities have attracted considerable attention, and the quotations have been well maintained. Canada Six per Cents, January and July, have marked 114¼; Ditto, March and September, 113½; Ditto, 1879, 111½; Ditto, 1882, 112½; Ditto Five per Cents, 100⅝; Ditto Scrip, 20¼; New South Wales Five per Cents, 1871 to 1876, 99⅜; Ditto, 1888 and upwards, 99⅜; Victoria Six per Cents, 111⅝.

The Miscellaneous Market continues steady. THE MARKETS.

Corn Exchange, Feb. 20.—Only a moderate supply of English wheat was on offer in to-day's market; but the general condition of the samples exhibited a farther improvement. For most kinds the demand ruled steady, at fully last week's prices. Foreign wheat—the show of which was reasonably good—changed hands slowly, on former terms. Floating cargoes, however, were tolerably firm. There was an active inquiry for barley, at extreme currencies; but malt ruled somewhat heavy, at barely late rates. Oats commanded extreme quotations, with a steady fall; whilst both beans and peas, as well as flour, were steady in price.

Feb. 22.—For all kinds of produce there was a fair demand to-day, and Monday's currency was well supported.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 37s. to 49s.; ditto, white, 38s. to 53s.; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 37s. to 47s.; rye, 30s. to 31s.; grinding barley, 25s. to 27s.; distilling ditto, 28s to 30s.; malting ditto 30s. to 44s.; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 49s. to 69s.; brown ditto, 48s. to 49s.; Kingston and Ware, 54s. to 69s.; Chevalier, 70s. to 72s.; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 20s. to 25s.; potato ditto, 26s. to 30s.; Youghal and Cork, black, 20s. to 25s.; ditto white, 20s. to 28s.; tick beans, 34s. to 36s.; grey peas, 33s. to 35s.; maple, 37s. to 38s.; white, 36s. to 39s.; boilers, 36s. to 40s. per quarter. Town-made flour, 41s. to 43s.; town households, 37s. to —; country marks, 30s. to 36s. per 280lb.; American flour, 22s. to 27s. per barrel; French, 29s. to 36s. per sack.

Seeds.—Rapeseed moves off steadily, at very full prices. Other seeds are dull, but not cheaper. Cakes rule inactive.

Linseed, English crushing, 48s. to 52s.; Calcutta, 49s. to 51s.; hempseed, 34s. to 36s. per quarter; coriander, 14s. to 16s. per cwt; brown mustard seed, 12s. to 14s.; ditto, white, 13s. to 15s.; tares, 7s. to 7s. 6d. per bushel; English rapeseed, 58s. to 60s. per quarter; linseed cakes, English, £9 5s. to £10; ditto, foreign, £9 0s. to £10 15s.; rape cakes, £5 5s. to £6 per ton; canary, 50s. to 53s. per quarter; red clover, 40s. to 60s.; white ditto, 83s. to 94s. per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7d. to 7½d.; of household ditto, 5d. to 6½d. per 4-lb. loaf.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 43s. 11d.; barley, 24s. 11d.; oats, 21s. 11d.; rye, 31s. 10d.; beans, 38s. 6d.; peas, 36s. 2d.

The Six Weeks' Averages.—Wheat, 43s. 9d.; barley, 34s. 8d.; oats, 21s. 5d.; rye, 31s. 4d.; beans, 38s. 5d.; peas, 36s. 1d.

English Grain Sold last Week.—Wheat, 117,309; barley, 71,544; oats, 17,985; rye, 55; beans, 7230; peas, 1581 quarters.

Tea.—The public sales held this week have gone off slowly, at barely late rates. Privately very little is doing. The shipments from China show an increase of about 21,500,000lb. when compared with last year.

Sugar.—We have no change to notice in the value of any kind of raw sugar, and the demand is confined to very moderate quantities. West India has sold at 34s. to 45s.; fine Bengal, 40s. to 46s; and fine Mauritius, 41s. to 45s. per cwt. Refined goods are in fair request, at 51s. to 51s. 6d. for common brown lumps.

Coffee.—Our market generally is firm, and late rates are well supported.

Rice.—There is an improved inquiry for this article, at extreme rates.

Provisions.—For most descriptions of butter the inquiry is somewhat restricted: nevertheless, prices are supported. Bacon is dull, but not cheaper. Other provisions move off slowly.

Tallow.—The demand has fallen off, and prices have slightly given way. P.Y.C., on the spot, is selling at 59s. 6d. to 59s.; and for delivery during the last three months, 53s. to 52s. 9d. per cwt.

Oils.—Linseed oil is quoted at 27s. 6d. per cwt. on the spot. Olive is active, at £60 for Gallipoli, and £53 for Mogadore. Spirits of turpentine, 36s. to 37s. per cwt.

Spirits.—Rum continues to move off slowly, at about last week's decline in value. Brandy is less active, yet prices rule high—the best qualities being worth 12s. per gallon.

Hay and Straw.—Meadow hay, £2 16s. to £4 8s; clover ditto, £4 0s. to £5 5s.; and straw, £1 6s. to £1 10s. per load. Trade steady.

Coals.—Best house coals, 18s. 6d. to 19s.; seconds, 16s. to 17s. 6d.; Hartley's, 13s. 3d. to 14s. 3d.; and manufacturers', 12s. 9d. to 13s. 3d. per ton.

Hops.—New qualities support previous quotations; but the demand for them is inactive. Other kinds are very dull, and lower to purchase.

Wool.—Owing to the approaching public sales the demand for all kinds of wool is very inactive, on former terms.

Potatoes.—The supplies continue moderate, and the demand is steady, at from 80s. to 150s. per ton.

Metropolitan Cattle Market, Thursday, Feb. 23.—Although only a moderate supply of beasts was on sale here to-day, the demand for all breeds ruled inactive, at about Monday's currency. Sheep, the show of which was rather limited, changed hands slowly; nevertheless, the quotations were supported. The few lambs in the market moved off heavily, at from 6s. 2d. to 6s. 10d. per 8lb. The sale for calves was extremely inactive, at a decline in prices of fully 4d. per 8lb., the top figure not exceeding 5s. 6d. Prime small pigs were in fair request, but inferior pork, as well as milch cows, sold heavily, at late rates. Per 8 lb. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s. 4d. to 3s. 6d.; second quality ditto, 3s. 8d. to 4s. 2d.; prime large oxen, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 8d.; prime Scots, &c., 4s. 8d. to 4s. 10d.; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s. 8d. to 4s. 2d.; second quality ditto, 4s. 4d. to 4s. 10d.; prime coarse-woolled sheep, 5s. 0d. to 5s. 4d.; prime Southdown ditto, 5s. 6d. to 5s. 8d.; large coarse calves, 4s. 8d. to 5s. 0d.; prime small ditto, 5s. 2d. to 5s. 6d.; large hogs, 3s. 6d. to 3s. 10d.; neat small porkers, 4s. 2d. to 4s. 10d.; suckling calves, 19s. to 22s.; and quarter-old store pigs, 28s. to 29s. each. THE TWO NEW ASSOCIATES OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

W. C. T. DOBSON, A.R.A.

It has been sometimes charged against the Royal Academy that its members are not insensible to the charms of good living, and the fascinations o friendship cul-ivated and ripened at the festive board; and that the elections to academic honours have often been more or less influenced by such considerations. That the self-elected forty do not despise the claims of the culinary art as an associate of, or assistant to, Fine Art proper is evident from the fact that their annual exhibition is always inaugurated with a "spread," when the newly-varnished pictures are introduced to the gaze of the world of taste and fashion amid the fumes of turtle and turbot, and the poppings of champagne. But, after all, this proceeding is perhaps only a covert rebuke upon the patron-public, whose preceptions require priming from within before they can appreciate the efforts of genius decorating the walls, and whose pockets are only to be got at through their stomachs. That the Academicians should carry the same feeling home with them, and adopt it as a guiding principle in the constitution of their body—that the associate and academician are, as a rule, elected in recognition of their convivial powers, and other social qualities—is what, although we have often heard it repeated, we are not disposed to believe. No doubt there are certain considerations of personal merit and private regard which it is difficult altogether to set aside even in the exercise of an elective franchise of a quasi public nature, and which, cæteris paribus or nearly so, might not unnaturally turn the scale in favour of the man who had always a welcome to offer at his well-furnished mahogany. But further than this we are not disposed to concede the charge of undue postprandial influences in Trafalgar-square; and even this extent of private influence will probably give way in time in deference to public opinion, as by degrees public opinion expresses itself more and more definitely and emphatically. And certainly, if the imputations of the nature we have just been discussing had at any time any foundation, they are wholly inappropriate as regards the most recent exercise of the electoral functions of the Academy in the choice of two gentlemen as Associates whose Portraits we give in the present number. Both are working men in the strictest sense of the word; and no two working men in the lists of academic candidates ever did less in the way of dining out and giving dinners. Mr. O'Neil, pursuing his industrious career in the seclusion of his studio, has not yet started his chef, nor graduated in the science of vintages; whilst Mr. Dobson, for many years past, has been a great deal abroad, far removed from personal intercourse with the Potentates of the Academy. We may add that in both these selections, more especially that of Mr. O'Neil, we perceive a prompt recognition by the Royal Academy of a verdict already arrived at by public opinion. With these preliminary remarks we now proceed to record the few facts that have come to our knowledge in the lives of the two artists mentioned, beginning with Mr. Dobson.

William Charles Thomas Dobson was born at Hamburg in the year 1817, being of English parentage on the male side only. His father, John Dobson, was for many years a merchant in the above-named city; but, having suffered severe losses, returned to London with his family about the year 1826. The subject of our memoir had from earliest childhood evinced a great taste for drawing, which his friends, fortunately, encouraged. He commenced his studies from the antique in the British Museum, about the year 1835, and was admitted a student of the Royal Academy in 1836. He received his first instruction in painting from Mr. E. Opie, of Plymouth, a nephew of the late John Opie, R.A., who took great interest in the progress of his promising pupil. Added to this he was so fortunate, early in life, as to be introduced to Sir Charles (then Mr.) Eastlake, from whom, during many years, he had the advantage of receiving instruction and advice—both given without remuneration and entirely as a matter of kindness. The fruits of this friendly teaching by a man of the cultured mind and pure taste of the worthy President are clearly seen in Mr. Dobson's works, which constitute a class of themselves, distinct, in many respects, equally from the rude, venturesome painting of the old English school and from the pedantry and elaborate finish of the new Pre-Raphaelite school.

In the year 1843 Mr. Dobson was appointed—such the public patronage of rising genius in this country!—Head Master of the Government School of Design in Birmingham, where he taught pattern-drawing and flower-painting for two years. But a drudgery so unsuited to a creative fancy, so crushing and discouraging to all aspiration for future advancement, could not hold him long. In 1845 he resigned this office, and hastened to Italy for the purpose of pursuing the study of high art in its noblest home. Before his departure the students of the school tendered him a presentation of plate, in grateful recognition of their esteem and high appreciation of his talent. After his return from Italy, Mr. Dobson resolved to extend and diversify his course of study by proceeding to Germany, now the seat of an important movement in art. During the last two years he has been painting at Dresden, whence, we understand, he proposes returning in the course of the spring.

The subjects painted by Mr. Dobson have been chiefly selected from Scripture or episodes of a devotional character. In his treatment of these themes he displays, unmistakably, what is so often wanting in the mere art of the schools—a love for holy things, and a reverential feeling which at once inspires and guides his pencil. The consequence of this is a prevailing moderation of tone, in which passion is almost entirely suppressed; a style of beauty in form and colour which denotes the safe middle course of contentment and health rather than the wilder passages of worldly strife and vicissitude. He thus creates a sort of idea kingdom, upon which the eye rests directly with calmness and pleasure, and which awakens our sympathies to wiser and more generous relations than the world in its every-day course learns of. That with these qualities he should not succeed in satisfying everybody is not surprising. The respectable author of a volume on "Our Living Painters," for instance, says of Mr. Dobson, "He is, we confess, somewhat too much of a purist for us, his works evincing a certain shrinking non-acceptance of humanity as a whole, which s ully weakens his grasp of expression and character. To paint scenes of human life truly we hold it necessary to accept human nature unconditionally in its entirety. Not by expressing man as less than man, we think, can the artist hope to touch the deeper sympathies of the spectator. Purism takes away from, "improves" nature; naturalism accepts the whole nature, but shows us it at its best. Between these two methods of treatment the gradations are infinite, but we cannot for a moment pretend to doubt which is the highest."

We quote this passage the more readily on the present occasion as it opens up the question between two styles of art which happen to be respectively very strongly illustrated in the works of the two new Associates whose memoirs we are now considering—Mr. Dobson representing what the author is pleased to term "Purism," and Mr. O'Neil naturalism. Agreeing, to some extent, with what this writer says to the superiority, in some respects, of the naturalistic over the purist treatment in art, we have yet to inquire how far they are respectively most appropriate, regard being had to the character of the subject treated. Now, Mr. Dobson's subjects are, as will presently be seen, with few exceptions, all founded upon passages in Scripture, in which sentiment rather than action is involved; and here, as we hold, the mind of the artist may most appropriately be employed in submitting his materials to a purifying process, and reducing them to an ideal as near as may be to perfection. Mr. O'Neil, on the contrary, dealing with passages of every-day life—passages which come home to the bosoms and hearths of the millions of wayfarers through this struggling world—does well to take his models from amongst the great multitude passing before him, and to paint them in feature and temperament just as he sees them. Both are right in their way; both would be wrong if they were to change places.

Of the works of Mr. Dobson we may enumerate the following as amongst the most important, and which were respectively exhibited at the Royal Academy at the dates indicated:—"Tobias and the Angel" (1850), in possession of — Eden, Esq., Preston. "The Almsdeeds of Dorcas" (1854), in the possession of Henry Wallis, Esq. (engraved and published by Messrs. H. Graves and Co.). "The Charity of Dorcas" (1855), in the possession of her Majesty (engraved in the Art-Journal). "The Prosperous Days of Job" (1859), in the possession of Henry Houldsworth, Esq. "The Children in the Market-place" (1856), in the possession of Messrs. Graves and Co. "Reading the Psalms" (1857), in the possession of Miss Burdett-Coutts (engraved and published by Messrs. Graves). "The Child Jesus Going Down with his Parents to Nazareth" (1857), in the possession of Miss Burdett-Coutts. "Fairy Tales" (1858), in the possession of J. Lancaster, Esq. (now in the hands of the engraver). "Hagar and Ishmael Sent Away" (1858), in the possession of Mr. Gambart. "The Holy Innocents" (1858), in the possession of W. Bowman, Esq. "Der Rosenkrum" (1859). "And he (David) bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow" (1859), the last two bought by Lewis Pocock, Esq.

HENRY O'NEIL, A.R.A.

We have already, in the preceding notice, referred incidentally to the subject of our present memoir, and, the materials of his life available to our hand being but slight, we shall be excused for dealing with him with comparative brevity. There have been few instances in the history of British art of rapid advance to honours and rank in public estimation to compare with that of the painter of "Eastward Ho!" Willie is the only man who, before him, won fame and fortune by a single performance as he has done. In saying this we are, of course, perfectly aware that Mr. O'Neil had tried his hand many years before the production of this remarkable work, exhibiting, from time to time, pictures of far more than ordinary merit which stamped him to be a rising man. But it was not until the appearance of this picture that he singled himself out from the general run of exhibiting artists, or, to use a homely phrase, "hit the right nail on the head" having done so, may he clinch it too. With such a start as he had it will be his own fault if he do not carry all before him in his own particular line, which, be it observed, is one which is emphatically popular.

Mr. O'Neil was born at St. Petersburg, of British parents, in the year 1817. In 1823 he was brought over to England, and soon afterwards began to give evidence of taste and talent for design. He appears to have had the advantage of any culture in this line till 1837, when he became a student of the Royal Academy. He exhibited his first picture in 1839, after which time he yearly sent something to the Royal Academy, but still with no result which may be termed remarkable. In 1840 appeared the "Jephthah's Daughter," a creditable work, afterwards engraved in the Art-Journal, 1844. "Ruth and Naomi," which was purchased by Prince Albert. To pass over others, we have, in 1849, "The Last Moments of Argyle," in 1851, "The Scribes Reading the Chronicles to King Ahasuerus;" in 1853, "Queen Catharine's Dream;" in 1855, "The Return of the Wanderer," which has been engraved. In this picture, representing a young woman, long a wanderer from her home, kneeling in grief over the grave of her mother, whose death-stone first meets her eyes as she returns from the inscription on the tombstone, Mr. O'Neil (after a dubious career amidst uncongenial History and Poetry) plunged into the great world of nature and real life, in which he has since achieved such noteworthy triumphs, and which, we presume, he will not abandon in a hurry for any other. In 1858 appeared the "Eastward Ho!" which was engraved in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for May 22, 1858, and which to describe now were a work of supererogation. We believe we may state that the suggestion of this subject was purely accidental. The artist happened to be going down the river one day in a steamer, when he saw a crowd of boats shipping a party of soldiers on board a transport, bound for the then sad scene of strife and bloodshed (India), and hurriedly taking leave of their wives and families—in too many cases taking leave for ever. The artist was struck with what he saw, felt his subject, and produced a work which will live for ages in the sympathies of his enterprising countrymen in all quarters of the globe.

In the next year he produced a worthy companion picture, "Home Again," the poetry of which was more gratifying if not so true, but a work quite equal in artistic treatment to its predecessor. For the coming exhibition of 1860 the new Associate is preparing a picture, on an original theme, of even a more powerful and exciting character, the subject being a volunteer about to swim from a wreck, to convey a rope to the shore, as a last hope of saving his shipmates, who crowd in agitated groups upon the forecastle.

Mr. O'Neil's style is essentially truthful—true to nature, true in drawing, true in colour—and with these qualities he cannot fail of securing a large and intelligent circle of admirers.

MAP SHOWING THE POSITIONS OF SAVOY AND NICE.

SAVOY AND NICE.

AMONG the political complications of Europe not the least was the rumoured annexation to the French empire of Savoy and Nice. Nice is the question entirely removed, even now, from that category, although the assurance has been officially given us that the Emperor Napoleon will not take any overt step in the matter until the kingdom of Sardinia shall have been formally augmented by the addition of the Central Italian provinces; and a promise has also been given that his loyalty will never affect the annexation of these provinces unless with the consent of their inhabitants, nor proceed to say final decision in the matter without having previously consulted the great Powers of Europe. Indeed, Savoy and Nice have been claimed for France as a natural right by some of the French journals. "Does it not suffice," says the Patrie, "to cast a glance upon the map to understand that it is a fragment detached from our territory? Treaties made in hatred to France may have decided otherwise, but they have outraged geography, and diplomacy in 1815 was in flagrant opposition to nature. A wise and enlightened power will re-establish the proper state of things. No obstinacy will be shown in separating territories connected by so many bonds. Like Savoy, the county of Nice will again become French, and that great nation called France will no longer have for a frontier a rivulet called the Var." Sardinia has, it appears, made no engagement to cede Savoy to France; and Switzerland has signified to our Government that she has no desire to see any change effected, though, in case of this transfer, the neutral territory would, in all probability, be made over to her, England having intimated her intention to support the neutrality. It is not our purpose, however, to enter into the political bearings of the subject. As chroniclers of the news of the day, we have given from time to time the sayings touching this matter. For the present we content ourselves with giving the accompanying Map, by which the relative positions of Savoy and Nice to France on the one hand, and to Sardinia on the other, may be plainly seen.

The Duchy of Savoy, forming one of the Continental divisions of the kingdom of Sardinia, in the valley of the Rhone, is separated by the Alps from Italy on the east and Piedmont on the south, by the Rhone from France on the west, and partly by the Lake of Geneva from Switzerland on the north. Its area is 4270 square miles, and its population in 1850 was estimated at 610,900. It is situated in the basin of the Rhone, besides which river it is watered by the Durance, Arve, Isère, and its affluent the Arc. Mont Blanc is on its south-east frontier, and it contains Little St. Bernard, Mont Iseran, Mont Cenis, and many of the other principal mountains of the Alps. The valleys are narrow, and great destruction is often caused by avalanches. The chief lakes are those of Annecy and Bourget. Its climate is similar to that of Switzerland. Its soil is infertile, and little corn is raised. Cattle-rearing is the principal branch of industry; the vine is cultivated in the more sheltered spots. Its mineral comprises iron, copper, silver, lead, and coal; the mineral springs of Aix, near Chambery, are celebrated, and salt is there made extensively. Many Savoyards quit their mountains in early youth, in order to exercise in France and other countries the professions of petty traders and domestic servants. Savoy is divided into eight provinces—Savoy Proper, Upper Savoy, Tarantaise, Maurienne, Carouge, Chablais, Faucigny, and Genevese. The Duchy of Savoy was the nucious of the kingdom of Sardinia. Chambery is its chief town. During the French Empire, under Napoleon I., it formed the department of Mont Blanc, and part of that of Leman.

The province of Nice, situated in the north-west of Italy, in the Sardinian States, is surrounded by Genoa, Monaco, the Maritime Alps, the French department of the Var, and the Mediterranean. Its length is fifty miles, and its breadth from thirty to forty miles. Nice, the capital of the above province, a seaport, is within four miles of the French frontier. It is situated in a plain. Its chief edifices are a palace, cathedral, convents, and hospitals; a theatre, bath establishments, an English chapel, and a triumphal arch. The port on the east, beyond Monte Albano, is protected by a mole. It has manufactures of wine, oil, silk, and perfumery, and is a free port. The population of this county of Nice, according to the census taken in 1858, is 125,000 inhabitants; that of the town, of Nice is 44,000, including the garrison and the strangers, who only remain during the few months in winter. The annexation of Nice to France would add little to her territory, but it would give her a magnificent strategical position, and the harbour of Villafranca would be a valuable acquisition to France. The following historical details, contained in a letter from Nice, will be of interest under existing circumstances:—"The foundation of Nice is due to a colony from Marseilles, and dates as far back as three hundred years before the birth of our Saviour. The colony remained dependent on Marseilles until the reign of Augustus Cesar, who placed it under the jurisdiction of Cemenelum, a Roman town, of which the ruins are still to be found near Nice. During the war of the disputed succession of Joseph Joanna I. of Naples, the people of Nice had recourse for protection to Amadeus VII. of Savoy; and in 1402 King Ladislas of Naples, and soon after his competitors of the house of Anjou, renounced their claims upon Nice to Amadeus VIII., Duke of Savoy and Prince of Piedmont. The county of Nice has remained ever since, with brief interruptions of temporary conquest, subject to the house of Savoy. The circumstances connected with the annexation of Nice to France deserve notice. The French troops, under the command of Napoleon, entered Nice with enthusiasm, and a similar reception was given to another body under General Montesquieu, when they entered Chambery. Immediately after the entrance of the French troops two deputies were sent to the Convention by the inhabitants of Nice to demand their annexation to France. One of these was Blanqui, the father of the political economist, and he explained the wishes of his fellow-citizens at the sitting of the Convention the 21st of October, 1792. The President immediately placed the resolution among the orders of the day, but on the observation of Barrere that previous to the annexation of one nation to another the wishes of the people should be fully and freely expressed, the Convention declared that they could not entertain the question until the people had voted on it. The electors of Nice assembled on the 9th of December, and Blanqui again presented himself before the Convention on Jan. 11 to renew his demand. The annexation was finally voted at the proposal of Cambon on the 31st of the same month.

THE EXHIBITION OF THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

The exhibition at the British Institution rather improves upon a second visit. If not remarkable for the high merit of the greater proportion of the works, it is interesting as illustrating the struggle now making in onward progress and the resources and appliances which the experimental artist will avail himself of in search of popularity. That these experimental ventures are always to be approved of we are far from wishing to imply, but they are important as evidencing the state of the public taste, which the artist, as in duty bound, endeavours to propitiate, and which must be elevated and improved if Art itself would rise to eminence and dignity.

A. Provis, for instance, knows that he is always at home and sure to find friends in his little interiors, so comfortably furnished and so admirably painted. He has two of these on the present occasion, which, in their way, leave nothing to be desired—namely, "Harvest Ale" (4), representing the well stocked cellar of an old-fashioned country house, and a young woman about to draw some of the frothing beverage; and "The Lacemaker" (107), painted in a charming warm tone.

C. J. Lewis has found ready purchasers for his two child sketches—"The Little Drummer" (6), and "Sunny Days" (10), the former representing a little boy with a drum; the latter his sister, with a small cart and other toys.

F. H. Calderon is rather too coarse in his handling in "Dressing for the Fair" (14), but the rude humour of the subject will command its full share of sympathy with a certain class of amateurs.

G. Stanfield improves unmistakably in his drawing, which is firm, sharp, and well defined. His study of his subject, also, as in "Huy, on the Meuse" (12), and "Dinant, on the Meuse" (236), shows judgment and an eye for the picturesque, but in colour he even surpasses the coldness observable very generally in his father's works. In the last-named picture he is very successful in realising the cold, fresh crispness of the atmosphere at early morning, and the coolness of his pencil is appropriate and truthful. But the atmosphere is not always cold, and the landscapist should be prepared to paint Nature in all her moods, and under all the aspects of changing seasons.

John Gilbert has produced a fine, spirited battle incident in "The King's Artillery at Marston Moor" (33). The rugged ground; the wild energy of the drivers, who urge their tired horses onwards with their uplifted lead; and the bustle and excitement depicted in every part, aptly typify the fury of that ever-memorable struggle. Passing into another vein, the talented artist treats us to a scene from "The Taming of the Shrew," act iv., scene 1:

Petruchio. Where lie these knaves? What! no man at the door
To hold my stirrup, nor to take my horse?

The heading passion of Petruchio is well assumed—a little exaggerated of course; the serving-men tremble in abject terror, and "gentle Kate" looks on in amaze. Mr. Gilbert's third contribution is the "Sancho Panza," of which we give an Engraving this week.

"The Home where Titian was Born" (46) is a subject worthy of better treatment than Mr. Holland has bestowed upon it. The drawing is careless; the colouring crude and opaque in the extreme; and that glorious sky which inspired Titian with his grand notions of colour—where is it?

"The Deserted Wreck—Winter Morning" (52), by Alfred Montague, has some good work in it, but betrays too obviously a recollection of Stanfield's celebrated picture on a similar subject.

H. Jutsum has produced a charming bit of poetic landscape in "Norbury" (53).

By the soft windings of the gentle Mole.

A verdant shade hangs above, and is reflected in the smooth, glassy surface of the sluggish stream, which is only here and there marked with the faintest ripple. Without, through the tangled branches of the trees, are caught glimpses of the cool, bright evening sky—quite a fisherman's evening; and sure enough a young angler is perched on the bank intent on sport which he knows is in store for him. All the details of this genuine English landscape are painted with an informed and feeling hand, which leaves little for the imagination to supply or wish for.

H. Dawson exhibits a very fine view of "Nottingham" (62), taken from the side of the river, upon the surface of which a small skiff is sailing. On the road on the left a market-cart is seen advancing, which is well foreshortened. The whole of the various parts of the subject are treated with boldness and breadth, under the glowing orange rays of a setting sun.

Another sunny landscape, but not so boldly nor so well painted, is that of "The Nile below the First Cataract" (81), by Frank Dillon. But here we not seen enough of the Nile, and of African desert scenery in general!

"Fishing-boats, Lagunes, Venice," by V. de Flauxy, is a rich display of colour, and a creditable performance in many respects.

"Florisel and Perdita" (82) is a little sentimental episode in "A Winter's Tale," which has been treated with appropriate sentiment by Mr. W. Faber.

"Cribbage" (108) is a favourite

"THE VICAR'S DAUGHTERS."—BY MISS EDWARDS.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

"NORBURY."—BY HENRY JUTSUM.

subject with genre painters, and its resources have pretty well been exhausted. Mr. Haynes adopts it, however, and tries to infuse some originality in the face of the puzzled old gentleman who hesitates what card to play. The details exhibit a good deal of very nice finish.

The experiences of Spanish travel still contest the exercise of Mr. Anadell's pencil. In his fine picture of "The Spanish Flower-seller," which we suppose, he has not a bad subject, and he treats it in an effective manner. A muleteer, with a stock of the finest produce of the garden, is offering a delicious nosegay to a dark-eyed beauty, seated at her window, puffing his cigarette the while. The fine white mule who bears the fragrant store is an admirable specimen of animal painting. The distant landscape is rather stodgy in style, and some other portions of the picture bear the appearance of haste, but as regards truthful character, general effect, and rich, harmonious colouring, the picture leaves nothing to desire.

> Fondly gazing on that young face
> With anxious thoughts for future years,
> The mother watched each budding grace,
> And mused on all her hope and fears.

But the poetry of the situation is not quite realised, and the sentiment is lost in the elaboration of art. The little infant, a very perfect specimen of the kind, with delicate, transparent skin and little arms, reposes in an ample supply of the whitest of linen; but surrounding this is a display of textural work in the blanket and purple curtain overhead, and the many-coloured quilt in front, upon which the artist has evidently bestowed more pains than upon the child itself. The mother, leaning forward in a position rather very elegant nor very natural, is but an ordinary sort of person, in whose features we seem to read the engrossing theme of which the title lines would suggest. Nevertheless, the picture is a remarkable specimen of minute and careful painting, with great intensity of effect in point of colour, though the light is unfavourably placed in the interior of the conservatory.

A. W. Williams has a powerful seapiece, entitled "Lost and Saved" (213), in which is a wreck on a lee-shore, and one of the crew holding on by a spar, to whom a rope is being thrown from the land. The breakers roll on in majestic volume, and the excitement of the scene is well maintained.

"The Pet Bird-nester" (247), by F. Underhill, is a pleasing group of young people sketching among the rocks. But why always the cold, grey tone in which this artist habitually paints? Mr. Frith, R.A., Underhill, warm up your canvas occasionally, particularly for a winter exhibition.

"Winter" (365), and "Autumn" (277), by E. U. Eddis, single-figure subjects, are cleverly treated, in a rich tone of colour.

E. C. Barnes shows us a specimen of his quaint style in "Autonimes" (281) from a private box—manma smiling languidly, the three children all on the broad stare and grin of excitement. This effect is little strained, perhaps, but it is amusing nevertheless.

"Spending a Holiday on Hampstead Heath" (283) is an ambitious and in many respects a clever, performance by Mr. Goodall, in the school which may be said to be typified in Mr. Frith's "Derby Day." The various groups of personages in various attitudes of life are scattered over the heath, in many of which considerable humour is displayed. The principal of these is composed of a family of the middle class, with a pseudo-military figure, and a pale young urchin riding pick-a-back on papa's shoulders; and a touch of sentiment is introduced in the case of the child's mother, who is seated on a bank with child of a widowed mother, who sits, looking very pale and wobegone on a bank hard by. A donkey race, and a pair of sentimental lovers exchanging a fervent squeeze, complete the chief incidents introduced, the background being filled in with a pretty good view of the great city. The faults of the picture consist in a little over-elaboration of detail, and a coldness and hardness of treatment.

Another Walker and Cobbett (223), by W. Gale—yes, but a very different humour to that in "Fondly Gazing"—a lively, jolly, intelligent, staring girl, with lanky, uncombed hair, and a big woodedoll in her arms, which she is about to dress, and which is also a very clever little picture, which, all things considered, shall take rank next to that by Mr. Smith.

A. J. Woolmer's "The Conchologist" (390) presents a pretty sentimental group on the seashore, delicately painted.

J. Cook's theme from "Auld Robin Gray" (397)—"I saw my Jamie's wraith, for I cou'dna think it be"—exhibits considerable power in the female face. The faithful lover is a good deal out of look out at the apparition, considerably enhances the interest of the situation.

We are not generally enthusiasts in favour of still-life subjects, but there is so much truth of form, colour, and texture in Mr. Duffield's large picture of "Dead Game, Game, and Poultry" (406), so much firmness of pencilling and breadth of treatment—that we must refer to admire it even for its important artistic qualities. Of the composition the reader may judge from our rough sketch of it, and it will be seen that it comprises almost every description of subject usually introduced into pictures of the class. The hare is the greater variety, a cut meion, peaches, grapes, and other fruits, to each of which the artist has given due colour, texture, and surface-gloss are given with a precision not to be surpassed. The hare matting and the old rug or blanket hanging across one end of the picture display the artist's style of handling in a manner subdued, but not restriction—that of the rug, at any rate—might be charged as being too obviously premeditated for the purpose of display.

Miss Edwards has two female figure subjects, which are clever in conception and admirable in drawing—"Mariana" (326) and "The Young Daughter" (435). Of the latter picture, the two fragments itself by two very pretty faces and two very graceful figures, we have great confidence in giving an Engraving.

As a specimen of very creditable miniature-painting, with much of the quiet, storytelling purpose and intelligent expression which we remark in the French genre school of the present day, we may point to a small picture by E. Davis, entitled "Feeling an Apple" (344). What engrossing sentiment in the boy, face of the bigger girl, who is peeling the apple with a strict eye to economical waste of the fruit; and the hungry devouring eagerness in that of the younger one, who is looking on with eyes et cetera of the picture—old granny sitting by the fire in the background, a little cat among the crockery, and a mother, with whom she is evidently a pet; even the half turned-down sock of the girl, unimportant as it may appear, is one of the intelligent passages in this little group, are such as to show in no ordinary degree the being and hand of the true artist.

The "Mary Magdalen" (467) by Landseer is a pre-Raphaelite effort, which must not be overlooked. The flushed, impassioned countenance, long flowing, and rippling hair and voluptuous curves are very imposing; but they do not fulfil our scriptural notions of the Magdalen. The "Queen Eleanor" (537), by the same hand, is in many respects a more satisfactory performance.

"La Corda Rotta" (507), by R. Ansiconi, is a rather masterly study, somewhat after the style of Leslie, of a young girl singing, with loose, wavy tresses, singing to her lute, one of the strings of which she has broken while touching it.

We have already spoken with praise of Dickree's "Joy" and "Sorrow," in the north room. By the same artist we meet with "A Labour of Love" (585)—a lining figure standing with a fine, sturdy child on her shoulders—the subject of which we surely have seen before, and a very interesting "Cordelia" (609).

"The Ordering of Colour" (564), by E. Hopley, illustrates an incident connected with the life of Sir Isaac Newton, wherein he is examining a diagram of the relative proportions of the primary and matic colours which has been prepared for him by his niece. It is of a similar class of subject to others Mr. Hopley has engaged in before, but which we cannot consider very favourable for pictorial treatment.

"The Penitent Thief" (591), by J. Stevens, is a heavy academy figure, heavily draped, which will do little for high art, and is altogether out of keeping with the class of works by which it is surrounded.

But we must hasten to a close. It will be judged from the scope of our remarks that the landscape efforts in the present exhibition are neither very numerous nor important. There are one or two pieces in this line, however—in addition to Mr. Juteum's beautiful work, which we engrave—of which we must give a passing word of praise. "Stepping-stones" (236), and "Silent River" (370), by H. Chester, two charming bits of lasfaire; "Under the Pine-trees at Castel Lusano, Romagna" (603), by F. R. Bridell, with a nice receding distance, and a fine effect of tall trees against a cold sky; "Evening on the Thames" (120), by A. Gilbert; "A Welsh Stream" (266), by T. Danby; "Westminster Palace from the Thames" (376),with setting sun seen through the arches of the bridge, by J. Danby; and "From Dufferin Lodge, Highgate" (416), by Viscount Hardinge, a very creditable sketch, broadly handled. Of marine pieces, "On the Frith of Clyde, a Fishing Boat Taking Sail in Low Tide" (14), by J. Knell; "Mont Orgueil" (345), by J. Webb; and two bits by E. W. Cooke, "Fishing Boats on the Lower Tagus" (129) and "San Servolo and San Lazzaro, Venice—Evening in November" (236), may be pointed to as in every way satisfactory.

In the department of sculpture we will only mention a very graceful "Titania," in marble, by John Lawlor; an interesting "Child's Head" (1,000), by Alex. Munro; a "Portrait Bust" (1,009), and "Head," by H. Weekes; and a very pretty female statuette, by G. Halse, entitled "Playfulness."

GENERAL SIR W. F. P. NAPIER, K.C.B.

SIR WILLIAM FRANCIS PATRICK NAPIER, K.C.B., was the third of the six children of the Honourable Colonel George Napier, by his second wife, Sarah, seventh daughter of Charles, second Duke of Richmond, and was the grandson of Francis, fifth Lord Napier. His elder brothers, both deceased, were General Sir Charles James Napier, G.C.B., the famous conqueror of Scinde, and General Sir George Thomas Napier, K.C.B., a soldier of note, who lost his arm when fighting most gallantly at the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo. His younger brother is the author of the "Peninsular History of Florence," died a Captain in the Royal Navy. One brother, Richard Napier, Esq., a learned and accomplished gentleman, and one sister, Miss Napier, died unmarried. Another sister, Lady Lynedoch Napier, K.C.B., M.P., is Sir William's cousin.

Sir William Francis Patrick Napier was born at Castletown, Celbridge, Ireland, on the 17th of December, 1785, and entered the British Army in 1800. His career in the service was one of great activity, and in the field he became highly brilliant. Napier took part in the siege of Copenhagen and Walcheren in 1807, and in the Peninsular War from 1808 to 1813. He was engaged in the combat of Vera, at the battles of the Nivelle and Nive, in the passage of the Adour, and in the combat of Orthez. He was again engaged in the battle of Orthes. He served also in the campaign of 1815, but does not appear to have been in the field. He received the gold cross and seven silver and clasps for his services in the battles of Salamanca, the Nivelle, and the Nive. He received the commemorative silver medal for his military faith; and the silver medal with three clasps for Busaco, Fuentes de Onoro, and Orthes. He was present in many minor actions, and received other honourable distinctions. He attained the rank of Major as a Lieutenant-General on the 11th of November, 1851; was made Colonel of the 90th Light Infantry on the 20th of June, 1854, and raised to the rank of General the 17th of November, 1859. He had the Hanoverian Guelphic Order of Guernsey from 1813 to the beginning of 1848, and in the latter year was created a K.C.B.

Sir William Napier achieved a high reputation as an author. His "History of the Peninsular War" is a work which has long been placed as a standard work, and will be ever looked on as a classic record of that terrible and eventful period of warfare. Never was a more vivid history of equal excellence has ever been written. It cost the author sixteen years of continuous labour. He was himself a witness of very many of the events of operations which he has given to the battles. His wide acquaintance with military men enabled him to consult many distinguished officers, English and French, upon all he was especially supplied with materials and documents by the Duke of Wellington and Marshal Soult. The ordinary sources of information were also freely opened to him. Napier's "History of Scinde" also rivals deserves special mention. When Joseph Bonaparte fled from Victoria he left behind him his carriage, containing his papers, which, however, were without order, in three languages, many almost illegible, and of very important import, of which there was no key. It was the correspondence of Joseph Bonaparte as King of Spain. Sir William Napier was in a state of perplexity, and almost in despair of ever being able to make any use of these documents, when his wife undertook to arrange the letters according to dates and subjects. She made a clerk of reference, and succeeded in epitomise the contents of each. Many of the most important documents were entirely in cipher; of some letters about one-half were in cipher, and the rest of the letter written interspersed. All these documents and letters Lady Napier arranged, and by the rare power of her memory supplied the secret writing. The entire correspondence was then made available for the historian's purpose. She also made out all Sir William Napier's rough outlined sketches of battles, and almost illegible to himself, and wrote out the whole work fairly for the printer's use. Napier was a very rapid writer, and very few changes made. Sir William Napier mentions these facts in the preface to the fifth edition of his "History of the War in the Peninsula." He was also the author of various tales, reviews, and essays, among which may be reckoned his "Six Letters to Lincoln, Life of his Brother, Sir Charles Napier," "Remarks on the Battles and Sieges in the Peninsula," extracted from his "War in the Peninsula." He was also the author of various tales, reviews, and essays, among which may be reckoned his "Six Letters to Lincoln, Life of his Brother, Sir Charles Napier," "Remarks on the Battles and Sieges in the Peninsula," extracted from his "War in the Peninsula," "Remarks on the Military Commissariat," "Duke of Wellington and other Documents concerning Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Napier's Administration of Scinde," "The Government of Scinde, by Captain Rathbone, late Collector in Scinde;" and "Defence of Sir Charles Napier's Administration of Scinde," by Sir William Napier." His "Conquest of Scinde," his tales, reviews, and essays have also done him great credit.

Sir William Napier's first wife, Caroline Amelia, second daughter of General the Hon. Henry Fox, granddaughter of Henry, first Lord Holland, died in 1835. By this lady he married Charles James Fox, and has had an only son, John Moore Napier, Esq., and six daughters: all these four have been married—viz., Elizabeth, Countess of Aran; Louisa Augusta, who died on the 7th of January, 1858, wife of Colonel M'Dougall; Pamela, the wife of Philip William Skynner Miles, Esq., M.P.; and Emily Augusta, wife of Sir Charles Sir Henry Austin Bruce, Esq., M.P., of Duffryn, Glamorganshire.

General Sir William Napier died on the 12th inst., at his residence, Scinde House, Clapham Park.

SIR WILLIAM HAMILTON.—The following inscription has been put up in the vault of St. John's Chapel, Edinburgh :—"In memory of Sir William Hamilton, Baronet, Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in the University of Edinburgh, who died 6th of May, 1856, aged sixty-eight years. His motto was, by a pure philosophy, to teach that now we see through a glass darkly, now we know in part. His hope that in the life to come he should see face to face, and know even as also he is known." He not often says the footmen that so much humility and truth mark over the grave of so much greatness.

A bazaar of useful and ornamental work will be held in Willis's Rooms during the last week of April next in aid of the building fund of the Royal General Dispensary, Bartholomew-close.

THE STEPHENSON MEMORIAL INSTITUTE.

On Friday, the 10th inst., a building erected to commemorate the worth of Mr. George Stephenson, and his no less illustrious son, was opened with great ceremony at Willington, near Newcastle-on-Tyne. The building, consisting of an institute and schoolroom, occupies the site on which stood the cottage where Mr. Robert Stephenson was born, and where the elder Stephenson passed many years of his life. A Sketch of this cottage appeared in the Number of this Journal for October 9, 1858. On the inaugural day the village was gaily decorated with flags, which formed an arcade through the principal street, and on every side tokens were not wanting that the inhabitants of the place were a happy neighbourhood. Shortly after two o'clock a large crowd assembled in front of the Institute, whilst those who had cleared their holiday attire were admitted into the school. At the time appointed for the commencement of the ceremony the schoolroom was completely filled with a number of ladies and gentlemen, the former of whom were accommodated with seats immediately below the dais on which the speakers were assembled. The latter, with the exception of those on the platform, occupied the seats in the body of the room. The proceedings were enlivened by the band of the Tynemouth Artillery Volunteers playing a variety of pleasing airs. Lord Ravensworth presided, and gracefully performed the duties of various local speakers. A short history of the rise and progress of the building was given by Mr. Addison Potter. In 1852 Messrs. Coutts and Parkinson, who were large shipbuilders near that place, proposed to him that an educational building should be erected upon that site, as the means of education were very much needed in the neighborhood; and it was found that no better memorial could be erected to the memory of the founders of children. The sum of £575 was promised to the promoters of the schools, and £2,000 was subscribed, out of which there were many expenses; and this was all they had to commence a building which would cost £3000. For some time they were brought to a standstill in consequence of the death of Mr. Parkinson, and the untimely death of Mr. Coutts. In 1858, however, Mr. Robert Stephenson, in an interview which took place with Mr. Potter, kindly expressed a great desire that these schools should be gone on with, and he promised to add to the amount that had been already subscribed, the sum of £400 which had up to that time been paid, and also £100 each year up to the current expenses. The schools would have been opened last May, but that was prevented by the illness and ill-health of Mr. Stephenson, whom they desired to see present on that occasion. Mr. Stephenson visited the schools on the 3rd of May, 1859, and was received in the neighbourhood—and was very much pleased with them. His lamented death, a sudden death had been a very great loss to the institution, as he took a great interest in it, and no doubt it would have derived all possible pecuniary as well as personal assistance from him. The schools are now fully furnished, but are not finished and endowed it in such a manner that it would not have required any assistance from him. However, its friends would now have to do the best they could, and no doubt they succeed. It was the wish of Mr. Stephenson that Lord Ravensworth should preside at the opening, and he was also desirous that Lord Ravensworth's eldest son—a man who had known him in his younger days, and his lordship's brother-in-law, Mr. Liddell, when George Stephenson left his residence near the place where he (Mr. Potter) then resided, and to go into the employment of Lord Ravensworth. It was the wish of Robert Stephenson that the schools should be established as much as possible in that school; and in a neighbourhood like that, where all religious denominations are so much divided, it would be almost suicidal to adopt any one particular belief in which the children were to be educated. Stephenson wished for the best master that could be procured, and Mr. Goddard, a gentleman who was therefore selected, had been chosen for his qualifications alone. Mr. Potter then read a letter from Charles Dean, Dean of Hereford, eulogising the character and qualifications of Mr. Goddard; and he further stated that Mr. Goddard had been selected by Mr. Stephenson after a personal interview, in which Mr. Stephenson satisfied himself of Mr. Goddard's views. Mr. Potter concluded by expressing a wish to see his parents each Sunday morning in the school in order that he may see the male parents themselves using the room which had been established expressly for their use, and which would be entirely under their own management.

DINNER AND PRESENTATION TO MR EWING.

A DINNER was given at the Queen's Rooms, Glasgow, on the 11th of January last, to Mr. Alexander Ewing, Chairman to the Barony Parochial Board, for the purpose of presenting to him a handsome piece of plate in testimony of the services rendered to the Barony parish. The testimonial consists of a silver centrepiece, with six candelabra springing from it. On the base are three artistically-modeled figures representing "Charity," "Hope," and "Humanity," guarded over by "Justice;" and from the base also arises a vine-stem, supporting a crystal bowl, surrounded by a wreath of vine leaves. The whole base is in the form of a triangle, on the one side of which are the following words, and on the second the armorial bearings of the worthy recipient's family, and the third bears the following inscription :—

"Presented to Alexander Ewing, Esq., by a few of the heritors and ratepayers of the Barony parish, as a small testimonial of their sincere regard, and as an acknowledgment of the many valuable services rendered by him in discharging the various duties of his office as Chairman of the Barony Parochial Board.—Glasgow, 1859."

The piece, which is elaborately chased with scrollwork in relief, stands upon a handsome pedestal, and is a very fine piece of work, accompanying the foregoing is also a massive silver coffee-tray, of oval shape, with a handsome border, raised in the centre of style, bearing an inscription similar to that on the centrepiece. The whole was executed by Mr. D. C. Rait, goldsmith to the Queen, Buchanan-street, from a design by Mr. William Keddie, and the work is of such a nature as to reflect the highest credit on both these gentlemen.

THE JAPANESE AT NAGASAKI.—An one stall we found microscopes, telescopes, thermometers, barometers, compasses, guns, blade, trinkets, and mirrors—all of native make upon European models, and generally very creditably executed. The small, but the lowest estimate of the value of labour it was a puzzle how any profit could be realised upon the articles. The microscopes were highly creditable. The telescopes were framed in neat paper cases substantially thick and ingeniously contrived to draw out to a great length of focus. The glasses, indeed, were clear; the magnifying power was not great, but it was a marvel to see such an instrument sold for a dollar. The thermometers, on the principle of Japanesetoscope, six feet long when pulled out, it was quite as powerful as a gentleman as those we have seen in the hands of natives are in the habit of procuring for credulous parents when equipping their children as seaports. The price of these was 2 dollars, or 8s. 6d. The barometers 1 dollars 37 sterling! The Japanese clocks exhibited for sale were beautiful specimens of native workmanship, and proved to us that, that the people of this country are most cunning in the fashioning of metals. One was like these table clocks we see in the drawing-rooms of our friends, the case being open to scrutiny; it was six or eight inches high and about as broad, and it might be seen through the glass that the works were of Dr. Dunn's style of description. One day some great personage desired to have the construction of Cook's pistols and Sharp's rifles explained to him, in order that he might undertake their manufacture. Another insisted upon making arsenals at Nagasaki, and a third wished to establish a steam-engine and cotton mills at the specimens of ornamental bottles were very original and tasteful in pattern. Iron and brass were cheap, and coal was found in one or two inches diameter. Shells, with the latest improvements in fuzes, one prince could produce; and another became acquainted with the art of gunnery, and, I dare say, so shocked at the enormous price the Dutch charged them for their ammo'n, that a factory for their construction was established, and one complete engine has already been turned out of hand, put up in a vessel built at Nagasaki, and actually worked about the harbour.—Captain Osborn.

A Parliamentary return, extending to one hundred and eleven pages, was issued on Monday, containing a copy of the observations of the Superintendent and officers of the dockyards at Portsmouth, Devonport, Pembroke, Sheerness, Chatham, and Woolwich, and of the Accountant-General of the Navy, on the report of the Committee on Dockyard Economy; also a memorandum of the Surveyor of the Navy of the Admiralty, with board minutes thereon.

THE COLOURED SUPPLEMENT.

THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON AT THE BATTLE OF SOLFERINO.

Our efforts in coloured printing have hitherto been lavished on subjects of a peaceful description: we have at different times presented our subscribers with coloured pictorial illustrations of the beauties of Nature or the productions of Science, as witness our pictures of Italy, the Christmas Carol, Summer, the Great Eastern, &c. On this occasion we have had again to do with an Italian subject; but it is a scene of strife upon which we have been engaged—an labour; the sword has replaced the ploughshare, and the vineyard has become the battle-field.

Monsieur Beaucé, the eminent French painter who represented the Imperial campaign of the war in Italy, and who marched with the allied armies during the recent campaign, had committed to his canvas for us the scene represented in our present Engraving. It is the first painting which has been done even on the conclusion of the war; and we feel a pleasure, now that Europe is again in the enjoyment of peace, in being able to place before our readers an authentic and permanent souvenir of one of the most important battles of modern times.

The Battle of Solferino, which resulted in the Peace of Villafranca, has been so fully described in our columns that we need not here enter into the details of that celebrated struggle, in which the greatest energies, both of the Allies and of the Austrians, were put forth. We have only to describe the particular circumstances relating immediately to our illustration. It will be remembered that the long battle had been continued from early morning on Sunday as decided success to either army. Redoubts, farmhouses, and even villages had been won and retaken—thousands of soldiers on each side had been either killed or wounded—a pause was now necessary to ensure a victory, for the Austrians had sworn to their Emperor to conquer or to die. The effort was made. Towards the middle of the day, whilst the Duke of Magenta was advancing with his victorious troops on the centre, the Emperor Napoleon ordered General Manèque, of the Voltigeurs, supported by the Grenadiers under the command of General Mellinet, to turn their right from Solferino. Carrières—a village—was taken, and their enemies found to be irresistible, and which speedily decided the fate of the day. Our Engraving represents the moment when General Manèque received the command of the Emperor to advance with his brave Voltigeurs against the Hill of Cypresses and the Square Tower of Cavriana, seen in the illustration. An Austrian dragoon and prisoners had just been brought to his Majesty; but Napoleon was too much occupied by the movements of his army movements in course of execution under his personal direction that he could not find time to notice the welcome and hardly-won trophy.

M. Beaucé has well depicted all his personages. What lifelike energy, for instance, has he shown in the brave French trooper who is expostulating with his German captives! The whole tableau is replete with character, which speaks for themselves. In the midst of being historical; and, as it places on record one of the most important scenes of war which the present generation has witnessed, we feel assured that our subscribers will be satisfied with us for having deviated for once from the paths we generally follow during the "pipings times of peace."

THE TELEGRAM. BY T. ROBERTS.

Mr. Roberts has here touched a chord in the human heart which will find response in every bosom, whether that of the lord or the lady of the land. "The end of all things is Death." Honours, glory, duty, all end in the one fatal abyss, in which too often the hopes and life of survivors are engulfed. A nation's hopes in a trying campaign, such as that of the Crimea, or more recently that of India, are as nothing compared with those of individuals who, losing one life, lose their all. And the severity of the blow is unavoidably aggravated by the suddenness. A few days of suspense and hope—to-morrow the wires of the telegraph make widows and orphans, bereft of all, and sometimes without even present means to meet the most pressing requirements.

Such an incident as this Mr. Roberts has powerfully and truthfully illustrated in the picture before us. The cruel telegram, which has been hastily opened, is yet in the hand of the unhappy woman who swoons by no ready assistance. Her innocent daughter—the daughter—just'of the age to understand the nature of her loss—hangs over her shoulder inquiringly, and in vain seeking for some means of offering solace. The servant girl, and even the telegraph boy, stand staring in rough amazement at the sad scene enacting before them. Not the least affecting part of the picture is the little boy amusing himself on the floor with a drum and minnie soldiers, and who still gets on with his play in ignorance of the change in the family place. Through the window is caught a pleasant glimpse of the country and of the village railway station, which, by suggesting the health and bustle of life, offer a striking contrast to the speechless sorrow which reigns in the seclusion of that humble domicile.

THE PONT DE SOLFERINO, AT PARIS

SINCE the existence of the present French empire three new bridges have been erected over the Seine at Paris—the Pont de l'Alma, the Pont Saint Michel, and the Pont de Solferino, originally intended to be called the Bridge of the Tuileries, but subsequently named the Pont de Solferino in commemoration of the crowning victory of the Italian campaign. The decree authorising the erection of this new bridge, the least notable ornament that the French capital possesses, was signed by the Emperor at Tuileries on the 24th of July, 1858, and on the 28th of August of last year it was thrown open to the public. little more than a year having been employed in its construction. It is 450 feet in one side of the Quai d'Orsay, close to the Palace of the Legion of Honour, and on the other on the quay facing the Garden of the Tuileries, into which a new gate has been opened immediately opposite the bridge, thus greatly facilitating the means of communication by the seven Place Vendome and the Faubourg Saint Germain, which was previously difficult of access on account of the distance that separated the two bridges formerly connecting the west end of Paris with the aristocratic faubourg.

The Pont de Solferino, as will be seen in our illustration, is composed of three wide arches, the centre one 158 yards and the two wide 22 yards. The balustrades and arches are of cast iron, raised upon piles of masonry, each of which is decorated with an escutcheon bearing the Imperial crown and cipher. The abutments are of beautiful red veined marble, as also the parapets and the approaches to the bridge by both sides. The foundation is in masonry of the most perfect description. This additional ornament to the city of Paris cost 1,170,000f. (£46,800); and the expense of its construction has been borne in equal shares by the Government and the Municipality. On the panel of each of the four abutments facing the quays is the following bas-relief inscription in gilt letters:—"Pont de Solferino; construit sous le règne de Napoléon III.: 1858 1859.

COLLISION AND LOSS OF LIFE IN THE CHANNEL.—Early on Sunday morning the steamer Osiris, from Dublin to London, was run down off Beachy Head by the schooner Hermine, of Bideford. The Osiris sank in fifteen minutes after the collision. Sixteen of the crew and four passengers were saved by the Hermine; and the remainder, thirty in number, are supposed to have been drowned.

A RECENT VISIT TO THE FIELD OF SOLFERINO.

DR. GEORGE BENNETT, of Sydney, New South Wales, with a party of friends, went over the battle-field of Solferino in November, 1859, and during the visit a photograph was taken, from which our Engraving on page 176 of the present Number was made. Dr. Bennett thus describes this remarkable spot:—

We arrived first at San Martino, and it happened, that the day being very fine, a number of the Piedmontese officers and soldiers (many of whom had been in the action and were invalided) were visiting the field of battle with their friends, among whom were several ladies, who had arrived in carriages, like ourselves. The officers were desirous to show us the most advanced positions of the battle-field, and pointed out the different positions of the two armies, and the ground over which they had taken and retaken each house; the Piedmontese and retaken by the Austrians nine times. At length it became the property of the former, when although the ground in front grew burning in it the opposite direction, against the latter, in which state it remains at present. The Piedmontese lost heavily in this action, and their loss on this occasion was upwards of six thousand men; and the immense mounds of dead will testify to the truth of this. They showed us, to us, was very great from the Austrians firing upon them as they advanced, because the ground, for a mile or half a mile, was covered by the mournful cypress-trees, and which bear evidence of the battle, some being without their tops, and others having been entirely cut down across the line of this battery. From the number of them in the line of fire it is surprising the slaughter that was made. The Austrians had a great advantage in the direction taken by the Piedmontese. The battery was of very small size and a mere point for work, and very close to the enemy's position on the shot, and testing to prove, both by its appearance and that of the trees near, that the Austrians must have taken aim with great precision and effect more by the musket and bayonet than by cannon.

Observing that the Church of San Martino was a dense cluster of cypresses, we walked to it. On a declivity near to it there remains a small battery, surrounded by a ditch and earthworks, exactly as when left by the Austrians, who obstinately defended this position, but which was at last carried by the Piedmontese at the point of the bayonet. We climbed to the top and found many marks of the contest, more especially in front: it is well peppered by musket shot, and the ground is covered with the fragments of shells and earth, together with pieces of exploded shells, and are sold by the little children who play about the battle-field, and who are very keen to find them. We observed the infantry in much cultivated here, with clumps of cypresses dotted about in this, it was explained to us, to enable the fields in excellent cultivation, exhibiting no traces of the late warfare, and the whole scene as luxuriant as could be expected at the season of the year.

On arriving in sight of the village, tower, and hills of Solferino, we at once saw that the Austrian position was well chosen, and the line of battle can be easily distinguished. They were posted on the hills, which the French ascended, attacked, and took after a severe contest, during which they were driven back to the plain, leaving behind them twelve pieces of cannon. Numerous graves are seen on both sides. On approaching Solferino small graves are seen, by a cross are seen, some with wreaths of flowers over those of skirmishers, or, what is more probable, from the distance from the actual field of battle, and which, as we have before stated, were carried off the field, had died and been buried on the spot. We soon arrived at the little village, and, on entering the principal street, which is also the street at a wretched tavern, we walked up the steep hill by a broad, winding road leading to the top of the tower, which is the second in point of height to command a fine view of the country around, including San Martino, Cavriana, and the hills where the principal battle was fought, and on the north Lake of Garda, with the Tyrolean range of mountains in the background, and the Austrian position on Montebaldo. The tower of Solferino, like all the battle-fields can be well distinguished from this position. San Martino formed in a centre of the Austrian position, and Pozzolengo, which Victor Emanuel's position, and Pozzolengo, which Victor Emanuel's Volta the fourth: the last can be distinguished by aid of a telescope, and was three days in possession of the Austrians. The view is very extensive, and all the natural causes combined to enable one to enjoy the fine scenery of the country. Solferino is a dirty place, and not worthy of notice as a human being, but now so quiet and comparatively deserted, except by the local authorities and the few visitors who, like ourselves, have come to explore the battle-field. On descending the hill, and advancing towards the cemetery we found the church and other buildings were attacked, and the former displayed evidences of having been used as a hospital, as many of the windows had been shot, and over the entrance a deep indentation evidently from a spent cannon-ball. We entered the cemetery, which was surrounded on the front part of which had been pierced for musketry, and other parts perforated by cannon-shot. The graves are in the usual manner, and many surmounted by decorations made by the shot, and a picture hanging on one of the side walls has been perforated in many places by musket-balls. There are only two graves in this cemetery of those who had so recently fallen in the battle. One of these contained the body of a Piedmontese officer, which was rudely written or painted: "Ici repose la Baron des Chapelles, Lieut. 2me Regt. Grenadiers, tué à la bataille de Solferino, 24 Juin."

Our illustration presents an excellent view of the cemetery as seen from the road in front of the village. The graves are seen in every part of it, in all directions with indentations and perforations occasioned by the volleys of musketry that were poured into the cemetery, and the front gate of the cemetery there is a box for contributions for masses for the souls of those who died in the battle. The Austrians have certainly chosen a most desirable one for the Austrians; and it is a matter of surprise that with such a position they were ever driven from it. Many more graves could have been erected from them.

From the cemetery the road to the battle can be followed over the heights and on the declivities of the hills by the thousands of cartridge-papers covering the ground, and which are also to be seen in ditches, &c., and the slopes of the hills, there was strewed about also bits of cloth, leather, and paper, the latter being the wads of the muskets, and many letters picked from the ground. One we picked up was evidently written by a son to his parents, but was illegible, and was destroyed.

There were several mounds of dead marked by small rude crosses, and occasionally a few graves together, but the bulk of the dead are in the female peasantry. One mound was pointed out to us in which, in a deep trench, fifteen hundred Austrians were buried, and there are some horses; but no unpleasant effluvia arose from such a smouldering though although the heat was considerable, as it was the middle of June of the year. The opposite and severely-contested hill could readily be accomplished by the Austrians, and which they had done, and were in the evening evidence of the severe battle around and about them, although so much more time had elapsed since the conflict than when we visited it. The mournful monuments to the dead beneath them. We collected a great number of these cartridge-papers, distributed them to our friends, and also the children collected bullets for us digging them from the ground and from the walls of the houses and cottages. Many were thus obtained. Some Austrian eagles worn in front of the soldiers' caps I also purchased. It is a leaden plate, as they were not numerous, and grape-shot and Minié rifle balls, which, from being more abundant, were cheaper. Some of the Austrian caps were also purchased. The French soldiers picked up on the battle-field—one was named Gaudibert, 2nd Regiment de Tirailleurs de Algerie, and who was killed on the 24th of June, 1859; the other was named Rousseau, 8th Regiment d'Infanterie de Ligne, and the name of the regiment was also on his cap. The dead were pretty thickly scattered over the battle-fields, and, having collected some as mementos, we left the battle-field of Solferino, which is surrounded by the landscape.

We left Desenzano and arrived at Meyer's Hotel in the evening, situated close to the beautiful Lake of Garda. From this dirty little town we took the train to Milan, and on our way to Novara and Turin had an opportunity of viewing the battle-field of Magenta from the railway, about which are mounds of dead, with crosses upon them in great numbers; some are buried close to the railway, and also the bridge across the Ticino which was partially blown up by the Austrians: this is now repaired, and the train passes over it as usual; the railway station is just opposite, and many houses near; one in particular is riddled with shot, having all the windows destroyed. Our one of the largest mounds of dead, near the railway, a large painted wooden cross has been erected to the memory of those who perished in the cause of Italian liberty.

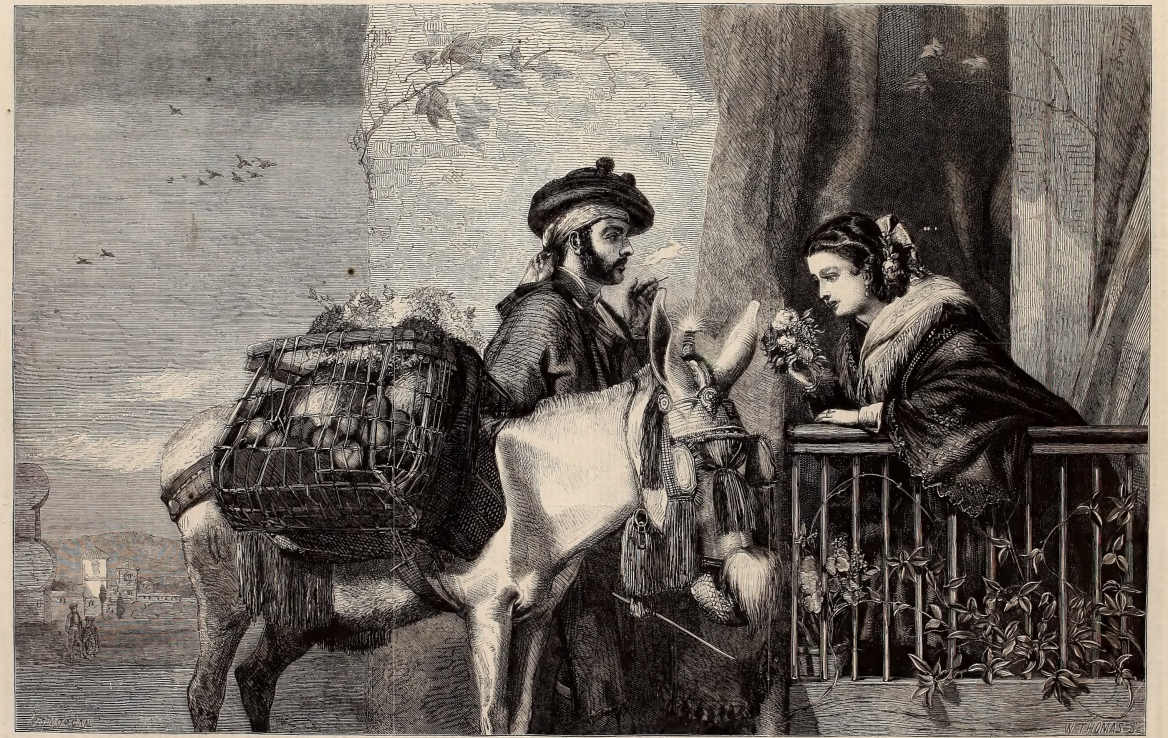
CONFLICT BETWEEN SPANISH AND MOORISH CAVALRY.

One of the most brilliant incidents we have yet characterised the Spanish arms in the African campaign is the dashing cavalry charge which took place on the first day of the year. On that morning the camp in front of Ceuta was struck, and an advance made towards Tetuan. During the early part of the march the Moors offered but little resistance, and were speedily driven from one position to another. Here and there, however, they showed some daring and even a disposition to advance against the Spaniards, and in one instance, which we have before us, they suffered considerably for their temerity. Overlooking a shallow wooded ravine a battery of mountain artillery had taken up its position. The Moors came on, howling furiously, waving their arms and brandishing their long guns, to the further side of the hollow, which men on foot could easily pass. There were a score of horsemen, and a crowd of infantry. They paused to indulge in their customary vociferations and cries of "Allah! Allah!" and this gave time to treat them to a round of grape, which sent them to the face about in silence. In the main body the little squadron of Spanish lancers had got well into the rally, preceding most of the infantry, and looking out for an opportunity for a dash. They had already made one insignificant charge, when the bugle sang out General Prim rode up to them and gave them an order, which appeared not to have been accurately understood. As the new bearing them he said something about their charging freely when they saw a chance, that the Moors were cowards and would not stand. The commander of the lancers misunderstood the words, and thought the term "cowards" applied to his men. The consequence of this mistake was that he ordered a charge, and with a very small handful of troopers literally the enemy's skirmishers and up a narrow and slightly ascending road, which led to the ridge leading to a plateau on the lower slopes of the mountain, where the Mo rish camp was pitched. The Spanish infantry was not yet well advanced in masses; a considerable force of Moors were still in and around the camp; and from his heights on either side of the confined lists in which the desperate contest was entered upon a storm of bullets fell upon the lancers, who continued their furious career until they reached the camp itself. Here they found a hand to hand fight with the Moorish cavalry, who greatly exceeded them in numbers; and in the rabble a Spanish corporal slew the Moorish standardbearer and carried off the standard. This is the only standard captured in our Regency. The Moors, although surprised by the sudden appearance of this very forlorn hope, fought desperately in spots, and many fine horsemen suffered severely. Two last officers killed and five wounded, while a great proportion out of two squadrons. One wounded officer fell into the hands of the Moors, who buried themselves with taking off his uniform, which they doubtless thought would bring a ransom. He escaped, however, half-naked, by his comrades, who charged to rescue him. Another officer was brought back with his face and nose cut to pieces by the Moorish gumiars—straight short swords, which are ground very sharp. The affair was a most unfortunate one, but, at the same time, highly creditable to the gallantry of the lancers. It was a fine episode in the various circumstances, of our own glorious Balaclava charge. In that instance, as in this, the misconception of an order was sent so many men to die gloriously for no practical gain whatever.

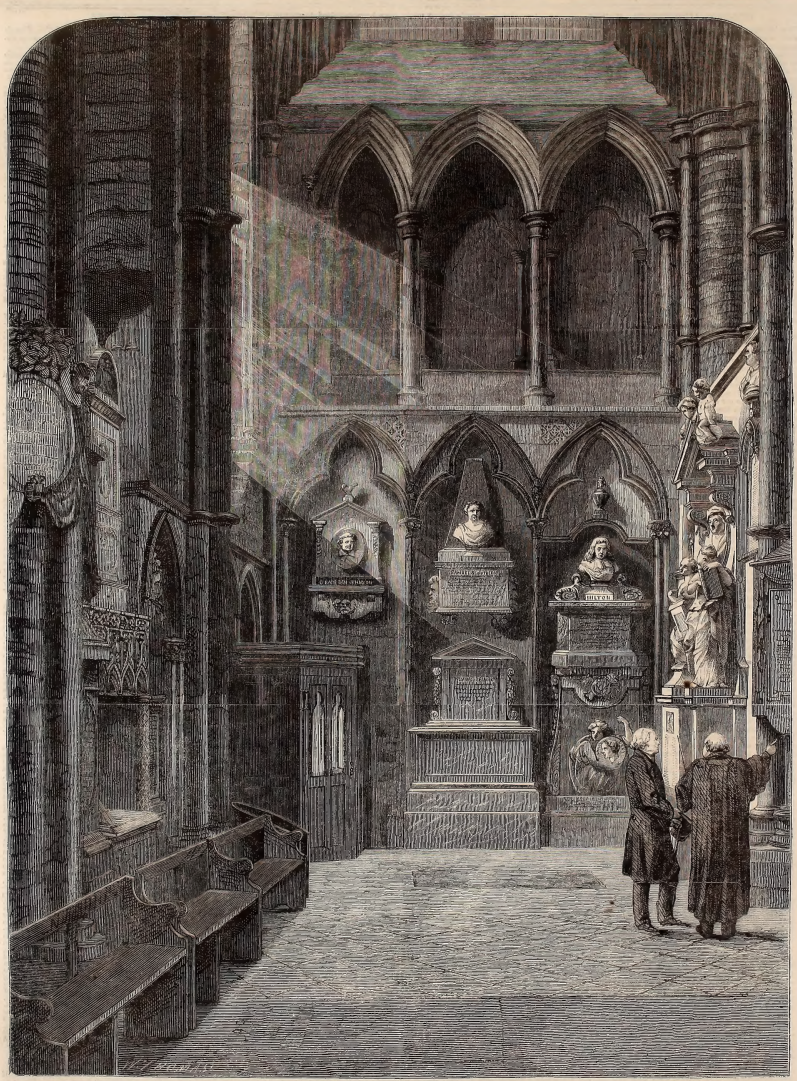
TETUAN.

A letter from the Times correspondent in Morocco, dated Tetuan, Feb. 7, is the first written from within that city. It describes the main character of the city, and the reception of the Spanish troops by the inhabitants:—



Early yesterday morning a renegade Cadiz watchmaker, Robles by name, came to O'Donnell's head-quarters, and said that the Moorish soldiery, both Moors de Re, or regulars, and the irregulars of the Kabyles or fellahs, had been assembling in the Plaza de Armas for several hours and, in the name of the inhabitants, he implored the entrance of the Spanish troops. It appears that the communication satisfied the Commander-in-Chief that the proper thing to do was to enter Tetuan, for General Ros d'Eroles was immediately ordered to march upon town and citadel. This was done, and the Spanish colours were planted on the latter. It is said that the Moors have to have entered Tetuan after words in Marshal O'Donnell's train. The gate through which he passed led in once into the Jews' quarter, and he found the streets the scene of desolation that three presented itself. The narrow filthy streets were strewn with dead of every kind—dogs, horses and asses, and, amongst, paltry merchandise of all descriptions, fruit, grain, smashed crockery—the whole blended in a confused mass. Many houses had been fired. When the spoilers had taken all they thought worth their while, or that they were able to carry off, they had themselves destroyed the rest. The Jews, who, as I afterwards learned, had shown signs of terror and for the most part hidden themselves in their dwellings on the first firing, had taken courage on perceiving that these were orderly and well behaved, and that no one insulted or ran over them, and into the streets, and even to welcome the soldiers with cries of "Bien venidos!" "Viva la Reyna!" and the like. They had evidently suffered much. Many were nearly naked; others had their garments torn, as if from rough treatment. Like all the Africans, Moorish Turkish, Jews, and quite Spanish; and they were voluble in their descriptions of what they had undergone. They pointed out their threads, and told how they would be stripped. Having thus cut by the wives and 'gormias' of the Moors. The city itself resembles us that of Gibraltar, and it is probable that there an attempt to fire it will be made until better acquaintance and greater leisure. Of the filth that disgraced the streets, and which was increasing every hour, we can never have had any run at night angles to them. I can give you no idea, even were it desirable to do so, of the foul, fetid, and hungry dogs belonging to the Moors. All the further end of a very narrow lane, heaped with rubbish and ordure, even which I glanced a human face, and a head, grey and long, bloodbedaubed, over a mural of raw flesh. I had not time, nor was I anxious, to read the Arabic characters of the text, but, from the form of some words they I saw sticking up, a horrible suspicion crossed my mind that it consisted of human remains. This was the case. There were lying in the streets several dead bodies of Moors lying on the street in different parts of the town, some naked, others apparently scarcely touched by the attack.

While the General and his staff were wandering—not very prudently under all the circumstances—through the streets, and many new apartments of the palace, two explosions took place, one within and the other outside the building, and three officers, one Spanish, natives and Europeans, were badly burnt. Some say the explosions were accidental, caused by sparks from cigars; but the Spaniards say they were intentional and deadly, although this appears to me improbable. Water was thrown over several times before the fire was extinguished, and the alarm created was needless. Many of the Moorish inhabitants had fled from the city, but many still remain, although in great numbers. The gallop from Ceuta on the night of Saturday, or rather at three o'clock on Sunday morning. The Jews say that the Moors are not yet reconciled to coming; for that reason the Moors, having taken all their property, would have cut their throats, on their return to Ceuta, if they had found it wealth they had not secured. Now that we have seen Tetuan and its capabilities of defence, we are satisfied to believe that the Moors have been severely beaten, and have abandoned about fifty guns and mortars of various calibre, some very large ones, a few of them of brass. Ammunition, too, they have left behind, and have away had they chosen to do so, or been able in a hurry. They have also left a large quantity of powder, shot, shells, bread, and cattle. The guns are of all countries, French, English, Spanish, Moorish, and some of them very old.



(TO THE EDITOR of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

SIR,—Having had the pleasure to read you, in your last number, account to my brother's "Review of the Volunteer System," contained in the subjoined which I am anxious to correct. I allude to the words: "We believe we are correctly informed when we say that the two eighteen-pounders which were of such essential service at Inkerman." The truth is that my brother, Captain Peel, commanding the Land Transport Corps, was not present in the field at that instance by the late Lord Raglan as to the feasibility of bringing forward the two eighteen-pounders, which were under the charge and direction of Captain Peel, and which were brought into action by Colonel Wood Dickson, R.A., to place those guns in position, and it was under his superintendence they were worked with such marked effect during that memorable day. In commemorating this fact, I can only bring justice to the merits of this energetic and gallant officer.—WILLIAM L. ARDY, Mary House, Dorset, Feb. 20, 1860.

The Windsor-cleaning Bill, introduced by Sir C. Burrell and Mr. Cole, proposes to subject to a penalty of 40s., or, in the discretion of the convicting magistrate, to fourteen days' imprisonment, any sweep or occupier of a house who may order or permit his servant to sit, stand, or kneel outside any window for the purpose of cleaning or repairing it, unless the window be on the sunken story.

"THE POETS' CORNER."—BY VICTOR PROUT.—IN THE PHOTOGRAPHIC EXHIBITION.

WHATEVER may be our opinion of the result of the application of photography to portraiture, there can be no question of its success in reproducing works of art, and more especially those in architecture. Here the use of the new process of sun-painting may be described as invaluable, whilst it is free from the objections which usually attach to it in other subjects. By this means the greatest works of ingenious men of all ages are brought before the eye with an exactness and detail which the eye and hand of the draughtsman, however conscientious in his work, could never attain; and at one glance the successive changes in style which have been in vogue from the earliest time to our own day are placed before the eye.

Mr. Victor A. Prout, a nephew of Prout, the celebrated architectural painter, has just completed a series of photographic views of the interior of our venerable Abbey of Westminster, twenty-three in number, which are published in a handsome volume, and which are also included in the exhibition of the Photographic Society in Pall-mall East. Interiors are always difficult things to manage in photography, on account of the deficiency and peculiar conditions of the light, and Mr. Prout has combated these difficulties with remarkable success. We have selected for engraving the view of Poets' Corner, a sacred shrine in the estimation of all Englishmen who treasure the mental achievements of their country. This interesting spot has never been represented in a more satisfactory manner. The view comprises the tombs of some of the earlier worthies of English poetry:—Chaucer (on the left), and then, successively, "Rare Ben Jonson," Butler, Spenser, Milton, Gray, and Matthew Prior. The light pours in from a window at the side, just sufficiently to illumine the apartment, and to bring into relief the principal effigies contained in it.

OUT-DOOR AUMSEMENTS.—MARCH.

The beginning of this month is generally distinguished by cold, keen winds and slight frosts, which are not very favourable for fox-hunting, and towards the middle, the sweet-scented violet and pale primrose, denounced by that celebrated sportsman Dick Christian in language we will not follow, have their flowers full blown, and by their strong odour destroy the scent of the wily animals. Stag-hunting, however, may be carried on, and a brisk gallop with her Majesty's hounds will circulate the blood with even a strong breeze blowing from the east, and which, according to the old adage, is "neither good for man nor beast." The "gunner," who for seven months has been in pursuit of grouse, pheasants, partridges, woodcocks, hares, and rabbits, may wind up the shooting season with a day with the wildfowl; and those who are hardy enough to brave the piercing cold or pitiless storm may have good sport out of a punt with the numerous birds that are to be found in the fens and meres. The angler, too, may commence his operations, if he is content with the unexciting amusement that carp, tench, dace, roach, and greyling will afford him. There is one amusement, however, to which the sportsman can have recourse, and which, though not carried on as much at present as in former years, comes at a season when foxhunting is over, and will break part of the tedium that intervenes between the return of that more popular sport—we allude to otter-hunting, immortalised by Somerville in his truly graphic description of the chase:—

Huntsman, bring
Thy eager pack, and trail him to his couch.
Hark! the loud peal begins; how greedily
They snuff the fishy stream, that to each blade
Rank-scenting clings!
Now on firm land they range; then in the flood
They plunge tumultuous; or, through reedy pools,
Rustling, they work their way: no holt escapes
Their curious search.

In illustration of the above lines we will lay before our readers a description of an otter-hunt which was participated in some six-and-twenty years ago, and the delights of which are still fresh in our memory.

It was in the year 1834 that, previous to what is called the London season, I betook myself with a friend to that country immortalised by Cotton as the one in which, during the early part of 1751, he had taken above five hundred trout. It is true, the period for fishing had scarcely commenced, and we therefore contented ourselves with rambling through the romantic valleys of this picturesque spot. A few weeks soon glided away, and we were about to wend our way homewards, when we heard from a gentleman who had extended a great amount of hospitality to us that he had arranged for an otter-hunt previous to our departure. Gladly did we accept the invitation to breakfast with him on the following morning by daylight, when we were to be equipped with spears and everything necessary for the hunt.

Accordingly we started at five o'clock on a fine spring morning from Llangadock to Talley. As our road lay principally over hill and dale we resolved to shorten it as much as possible, and with this view we determined to ford the Powey with our ponies, which enabled us to gain the high road by cutting off an angle of two miles. In about two hours we reached what our Continental neighbours would call "le rendezvous de chasse," where we found our friend busied at the door of his cottage ornée in arranging hunting-spears and giving orders about his well-bred hounds. Without further ceremony we entered the breakfast-room, paid our respects to the lady of the house, who, albeit at a most early hour, did not (as most fashionable dames would have done) complain of being called in the middle of the night, but, with a most gracious smile and welcome, presided over the neatly-arranged and well-provided meal. We were shortly afterwards reminded by our Amphitrion that the hour had arrived for our departure, and that he had been informed, from unquestionable authority, that near the bridge at Edwin's Fort, a seat on the banks of the Cothy, an otter had lately been seen engaged in busy slaughter of the trout. Having been joined by many gentlemen of the neighboorhood, we proceeded to the spot where the mephitic animal had been heard of.

But, before we proceed, it may not perhaps be out of place to describe my friend's hounds and give some little account of the otter. The pack were well matched in size, figure, and colour; were all wire-haired, strong on the leg, fearless of the water, and of unflinching hardihood. Every attention had been paid to their breed, which we understood was a cross between stout harriers and rough-haired terriers, the latter having a considerable dash of the bulldog in them to give that ferocity and true indifference to punishment which is so essential a requisite in an animal that is called upon to bear without crying out the bite of his amphibious prey, which is more severe than that of any other British animal, the badger excepted. In addition to the John Bull courage of the hounds they possessed another great feature—a true vermin antipathy to the game they hunted, and the result of the day's sport proved the excellence of the pack.

The Mustela Lutra of Linnæus is characterised by Cuvier as having three small molars above and below, a strong talon on the upper carnivorous tooth, a tubercle in the internal side of the lower, and a large tuberculous tooth about as long as broad above. The British otter of full growth is about two feet in length from the nose to the tail, which is of itself fifteen or sixteen inches long, and tapers to a point. In colour it is a deep brown, with a light patch on each side of the nose, and one also under the chin. The throat and breast are ash-coloured; the head is flat and broad, the mouth small, and the ears short and rounded. The eyes, which are diminutive and placed near the nose, have a somewhat vertical aspect. Its neck is thick; the legs are thick, short, and very flexible in their articulations, so as to enable them to act with all the ease and effect of fins in the water, in which they have great power, as well by the mobility of their joints as by the muscular strength of their members, and also by the close webbing of the toes, which, extending down to the very point, serves as paddles or oars, and gives them great power in swimming or diving. The otter shows great sagacity in forming its habitation, though as an architect he is inferior to the beaver: his lodging is called his kennel or couch, and his occasional lodgments are termed holts. His kennel, which he occupies during the day, is usually an excavation formed in banks by the side of rivers, large brooks, or extensive ponds. Aquatic, however, as he is in his maraudings against the finny tribe, he is very careful to lie perfectly dry, and he therefore constructs various couches at different heights, so that, let the water rise or fall, he is not subjected to "a damp bed." He is also found in the hollow of some large tree, or in the deep recesses formed by the intertangled roots of the alder. Of all amphibious creatures the otter is considered the most obnoxious to anglers; it is subtle as it is voracious, for he not only kills his prey, but with wasteful excess destroys much more than he eats. In some instances it has been known to prowl eight or nine miles in a night to catch fish for its young ones, with whom its maternal instinct is particularly strong, or to seek some new haunt when its former one has been molested. We have digressed. To resume.

After a hasty march we came within sight of the bridge, and, under a close-set bank beneath some trees which overhang the stream, descried an otter enjoying his usual morning's piscatorial repast. In a second, "Grip," the trustiest and foremost of the dogs, challenged, when the amphibious animal speedily left his couch, and, diving under water, made head up the stream, and was soon half a mile in advance. The hounds were then laid on, and the otter's ventings were carefully watched. In venting and respiring his muzzle only appeared above the surface, but his tract was observed by the bubbles of air he threw out. "Look out, there he is," cried Morgan Williams, a genuine Cambrian; and as he spoke the master of the hounds cast his spear dartlike, but without effect. In less time than we take to describe it the hunted animal was personally engaged with "Grip," "Crib," and "Vixen," and in diving drew the last-mentioned dog with him, who, until he was nearly strangled, never quitted his vicelike hold. Again he rose to the surface. "Take care," said Morgan, as I held my spear on high, and was about to strike, "or you will transfix one of the hounds." Happy was it that I was thus cautioned, for the eager pack were ready to sieze their prey the moment he vented, and had I acted on the impulse of the moment a valuable hound might have been sacrificed to my precipitancy. "Crib" now seizes the prey; still he makes a vigorous fight, but, overpowered by numbers, is about to succumb, when the barbed spear of the gallant master penetrates the tough hide of the dying animal, raising him in triumph "high in air."

Elated with the day's sport, my friend prevailed on me to remain a week longer in the neighbourhood, and, as my companions were compelled to return to their respective avocations, I was left alone free to dispose of my time as best suited my inclination. "Then no difficuity can arise," said the kind master of the hounds. "We have but a spare room in our cottage, which, though large enough for one, would not have accommodated three. Send for your things, and make my abode your head-quarters for as long a time as you can spare." To this hospitable invitation I gratefully consented, and in less than an hour took possession of a most cheerful room, furnished in the true cottage style, with a landscape from its window such as old Isaac Walton was so fond of describing. The river flowed in gentle murmurs through the most verdant of meadows, thick set with waterlilies and other aquatic plants; the honeysuckle around the porch oppressed the air with its delicious perfume; the lambs were heedlessly sporting under the wide-spreading beech-trees or hanging over their shadows in the water, and the birds from the adjoining groves were caroling "their wood notes wild."

Upon the following morning, with flyrod in hand and basket slung by my side, I strolled, accompanied by my newly-formed acquaintance, Morgan Williams, along the banks of the Cothy. Here he arranged my tackle for sewen, a fish peculiar to the Principality. The fly he used, and which I would strongly recommend to all anglers in the mountain streams of Wales (more particularly in spring), was made upon the hook No. 7, and is better known in those parts by the name of the cob-fly. Its body is composed of brown foal's hair, tops of the wings of a woodcock, some ruddy others grey, well mixed together, warped with pink and yellow or pink and light-coloured brown silk twisted together, and wing of a cock pheasant's feather. The river was in the finest possible order, for there had been a heavy fall of rain a few days before which had tinged it with a dusky but transparent beer colour; in addition to this there was a delightful breeze from the south, which just stirred the water, so that there was every prospect of success. Nor had I any reason to be dissatisfied with my day's sport, for after six hours' enjoyment I found that my return was ten brace of sewens (the largest four pounds and a half, and none under three pounds) "killed" and one "missing," for in winding up my wheel with inconceivable rapidity the line broke, and away darted a splendid specimen of the prey I was in search of.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT IN ITALY.

Turin.

Were I to report to you what I hear, "the Italian Question is settled; England and France are in perfect agreement; the Duchies and the Legations are to be annexed to Sardinia; Savoy and Nice, being small and inferior considerations, which will be, doubtless, arranged to the satisfaction of their peoples and the Great Powers of Europe." What I see is, however, not perfectly in accordance with the pleasant and peaceful programme. I see Austria reinforcinig her Venetian garrison with every strength of her army, restoring the fortifications of Mantua and Verona, and replacing the old artillery by rifled guns of immense calibre. I see vast bodies of recruits on their way through South Tyrol and Styria to join the Papal army. I see the French stealing in reinforcements, in small bodies at a time, to the army in Lombardy; replacing the ineffectual troops by fresh regiments, and refitting the granaries; while Piedmont is drilling and organising on every hand, her land forces increased, and her fleet, which will shortly amount to eight heavily armed frigates and several smaller craft, can be ready for sea within a fortnight. Are these, I ask, signs of peace and security? Is it thus men prepare for a period of commercial industry and prosperity?

The language of the local newspapers is not less menacing. The great metropolitan journals, like the Allgemeine Zeitung and the Opinione, are, of course, impressed with the reserve imposed by the weight of their authority, and the sources from which their information is derived; but small and local papers speak more undisguisedly, and occasionally are more true exponents of popular feeling. Now, all these are full of the probability of another war.

You will naturally ask where, and between what forces? France having declared her peaceful intentions, Austria averring that she has neither the will nor the way to fight. If a war should now break forth it will be between the Central Italian army and that of the Pope. An aggressive movement by either may occur at any moment. Within the last twenty-four hours a strong division of the Parmesan volunteers marched from Florence for Arezzo. Some aver that they have gone to repulse an expected advance of the Roman troops on Tuscany; others pretend that their destination is Perugia. Mezzo Capo has repeatedly declared that he cannot keep his army together much longer in inactivity. The very discipline at such times becomes a despotism, and the valiant soldier is really rendered a dangerous mutineer.

Is it the policy of France that this over-taxed patience should at length give way. Is this the game of him whom M. Montalembert calls the modern Machiavelli? Are these the reasons for which a powerful French force is maintained in Lombardy, so that, when the hour of a settlement has arrived, he should be in a position to decide the fate of Italy? Some of your English politicians attach little consequence to the French designs against Savoy, but a deep importance to their plan of annexing the duchy of Nice. It is quite true that to us every foot of Mediterranean shore in the hands of France is a peril the more, and she would, by this line of coast, obtain some possessions of vast importance, and no inconsiderable addition to her marine recruitment.

As for Villafranca, however, nothing short of an immense outlay will ever make it a safe or convenient harbour. In the first place, it has the almost unique disadvantage of over-depth. To anchor requires a hundred and eighty or two hundred fathoms of cable! Even with this, much of the bottom is hard rock, and has no "holding" whatever. Secondly, when the mistral blows, every ship is forced out into the open sea; and with the wind called the Greco-Levante there is great risk of being driven on shore. I heard thus much from one of the Russian engineer officers commissioned to report on the station, and who declared to me that, with their merely temporary right to the place, his Government would never think of incurring the expense of the necessary improvements. To the French, however, this would not apply; they would be the possessors of the port, and care little for any expenditure which would strengthen their position in the Mediterranean.

Now, France has declared that if Piedmont receive such an addition to her territory as should elevate her to the rank of a strong State, she herself will, for self-protection, demand that Savoy be annexed to her empire. What more reasonable for us, while concurring in this view, than to retort and say, every aggression by France on the littorale of the Mediterranean is for us a menace and a danger. We only ask mere measures of security, and we demand the cession of Elba to Great Britain.

Elba in itself is no very great possession, but would in our hands be a station of considerable value. It is to the Gulf of Genoa what Corfu is to the Adriatic. Surely Sardinia could not demur to an arrangement which would place near to her shores a Power that has ever been her friend and ally. With France at Villafranca, the presence of England at Elba is almost a necessity. It is the exact counterpoise of the Imperial influence. If it be only required, in compliance with the fashion of the times, that a popular movement amongst the Elbese should declare in favour of this annexation, give your Correspondent three weeks and the necessary funds at his disposal and he will answer for as full, as perfect, and as spontaneous a vote for this object as ever emanated from any of those emphatically styled the oppressed nationalities of Europe.

A grocer in Hartlepool who had been summoned at the county court by a merchant for £5 odd is said to have paid the whole amount into the court office in farthings. Assuming the truth of this statement (which, however, there is great reason to doubt, as the tender was not a legal one), the debtor must have given himself more trouble than he would cause to his creditor.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

M. Velpeau, in the name of a commission of the French Academy, has reported favourably on the use of the Corne et Demeaux disinfectant (composed of coal-tar and plaster).

Aimé Bonpland, the great botanist, the friend and companion of Humboldt, according to recent information, was born at La Rochelle, on August 22, 1773. He resided since 1816 in South America, and died at San Francisco de Borja, May 4, 1858, aged eighty-four years and eigh months.

Dr. Hooker on the Origination and Distribution of Species (the introductory essay to his "Flora of Tasmania") singularly enough appears before the British scientific world in the American Journal of Science. The author had kindly forwarded the sheets to one of the editors, Professor Asa Gray.

Terrestrial Magnetism.—In the new number of Silliman's American Journal of Science Dr. A. D. Bache, Superintendent of the United States' Coast Survey, gives a general account of the discussion of the declinometer observations made at Philadelphia, 1840 to 1845, with especial reference to the "eleven years' period."

Cultivation of the Silkworm.—M. Fintelmann, of Berlin, has recently proved by experiments that silkworms may be reared and enabled to produce excellent cocoons by being fed on the leaves of the following plants:—Ricinus, Acer platanoides and tataricum, Spiræa sorbifolia, Lonicera tatarica, Symphoria racemosa, Syringa vulgaris and chinensis, and Prunus padus and serotina.

The Great Auroral Exhibition (Aug. 28 to Sept. 4, 1859) is further discussed in Silliman's Journal. Mr. Prescott, of Boston, U.S., says, "I have seen the auroral current produce magnetism, decompose chemicals, and produce heat and fire." Notices are given by observers in Vermont, Massachusetts, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Pittsburgh.

Conduction of Electricity.—The results of the experiments recently made by MM. Guillemin and Burnouf seem to confirm the results of the experiments made long ago by M. Gaugain, and to show anew that the motion of electricity in a conducting-wire is propagated, not like luminous waves, but according to laws analogous to those which heat follows when spreading itself through a bar. Their mode of experimenting is given in L'Institut.

Spontaneous Generation.—This subject has been lately revived by the researches of M. Pouchet, who affirms the reality of spontaneous generations. This is denied by the great chemist, M. Pasteur, who, in his recent important experiments on fermentation, states that he has demonstrated clearly that the various infusorial creatures, on which Pouchet and others found their arguments, are merely the developments of germs existing in the atmosphere. M. Pasteur's important memoir, recently read before the French Academy of Sciences, appears in the Comptes Rendus.

M. Jamin's elaborate experiments "on the equilibrium and motion of liquids in porous bodies" are also given in the Comptes Rendus.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

Dr. Lankester gave his fourth lecture "On the Relations of the Anima Kingdom to the Industry of Man" on Saturday last, the subject being the class of annulose animals. The leech and worms were first described. These were followed by the various tribes of insects yielding useful products. The first group considered were the coccidæ, a little family of insects yielding cochineal, shell lac, lac-dye, kermes, and wax. The culture and history of the silkworm was next dwelt upon; followed by the bee, yielding honey and wax; and, lastly, the group of gall-flies, producing gallic acid—the important ingredient in black ink. The lecture was illustrated by specimens of sealingwax manufacture from Messrs. Hyde, of Fleet-street; of wax flowers, from Mr. Mintorn, Soho-square; of galls and other insect products, from Messrs. Savory, of Bond-street. Mr. Tegetmeier exhibited a new beehive, with specimens of the combs of bees.

Professor Owen delivered his seventh lecture "On Fossil Reptiles" on Tuesday last. After pointing out some peculiarities in the structure and teeth of the sea-lizard, Pliosaurus, which he called "one of his own children," as having been described and named by himself, he proceeded to the consideration of the flying reptiles of ancient times—the order Pterosauria—selecting for particular description the Pterodactyle (or winged lizard), still represented by the Draco volans of tropical climates, a lizard which is enabled by batlike wings to spring from branch to branch in search of its prey. The remains of the old Pterodactyles have been found in the lithographic slates of Bavaria, the green sands of Cambridgeshire, and in the chalke of Kent. The smaller species were about the size of a raven, the largest had probably an expanse of wing from 18 to 20 feet. The true character of the remains of this strange creature was determined by Cuvier. Its anatomical structure was ably described, and illustrated by the aid of large diagrams.

Professor Tyndall delivered his sixth lecture on Light and Colour on Thursday last week, treating upon the following subjects, with suitable experimental illustrations:—Colour-blindness, called also Daltonism (from the eminent chemist John Dalton not being able to distinguish colours—scarlet and drab being alike to him).—The eye may be rendered cognisant of objects within itself: thus, by means of a strong light cast upon his eye, a person may see the veins therein.—Total reflection is caused by a ray passing from a dense medium striking with sufficient obliquity the surface between it and a rarer one. This obliquity varies in water, flint-glass, &c. Beautiful effects were thus produced by throwing the electric light upon a jet of water, which appeared like liquid silver. These effects were rendered more brilliant by dropping sand and shot upon the jet, making it glow like fire, and by introducing coloured glasses.—Though in a less degree, gases reflect and refract light like liquids and solids.—Atmospheric refraction flattens the sun and moon when near the horizon.—By total reflection in the atmosphere the mirage of the desert is produced. The morning sun heats the earth's surface, the surface heats the air adjacent to it. In passing from the denser air above to the lighter air at the surface, oblique rays may be totally reflected, and an inverted image of the object from which they issue be produced.

Professor F. Crace Calvert gave the Friday evening discourse "On the Influence of Science on the Art of Calico-printing"—John Webster, M.D., F.R.S., in the chair. The progress of this art is based upon three distinct branches of knowledge—mechanics, art, and chemistry. Since 1815 machinery has gradually supplanted hand labour, and thereby immensely decreased the cost of production, and improved the beauty of the results obtained. During the early part of this century the production of designs upon calico was performed by means of hand blocks, of wood carved in relief like woodcuts; or the figure was formed by the insertion edgewise into the wood of narrow slips of flattened copper wire, and the patterns were finished by the hand labour of women, with small brushes called pencilings. In 1815 the gradual introduction of cylinder-printing began. The first kind of roller used was made by bending a sheet of copper into a cylinder, soldering the joint with silver, and then engraving upon the continuous surface thus obtained. Immense improvements then followed; and in 1834 began the tracing of patterns on the surface of rollers by machines constructed on the principle of the pentagraph. A very recent improvement is the application of galvanism to the diamond tracer. This is effected by tracing the pattern with a varnish on a zinc cylinder, which is so placed in the engraving-machine that, as a needle, passing over its surface, comes in contract with the zinc, the galvanic current is established, and by simple machinery causes the diamond to trace the corresponding pattern on the copper roller. This invention (of M. Gaiffe, of Paris) promises very important results. Chemical knowledge has exercised immense influence on the progress of calico-printing, especially by the application of chlorine gas as a bleaching agent, which property was discovered by Scheele in 1774, and applied by Berthollet in 1786. Afterwards the gas was combined with lime by Mr. Tennant, of Glasgow, who thus formed chloride of lime, or bleaching powder. By this latter agent calicos are now much better bleached in twenty-four hours than, formerly, by six weeks' exposure to the atmosphere. In 1820 Mr. G. Wood discovered the means of mordanting calicos by oxide of tin, and Mr. Walter Crum, in 1859, laid before the British Association a method of avoiding the tedious process of ageing madder goods (occupying three or four days) by passing them for a quarter of an hour through a moist atmosphere (temp. 80° to 100°). After this Professor Calvert dwelt especially on the discovery of garancine, murexide, alloxane, and other important colouring substances, derived from guano, coal-tar, and through the chemical researches of Prout, Liebig, Hofmann, Stenhouse, Perkins, Price, and other chemists. The lecture was illustrated by specimens from the most eminent manufacturers in the kingdom; and a valuable pattern-book, commencing with 1790, which once belonged to the first Sir Robert Peel, was laid on the table through the kindness of Mr. W. Grant. In 1858, 785,666,473 yards of printed calico were exported, valued at £13,147,280.

Sir Henry Somerset has taken passages to England for himself and family by the mail which leaves Bombay on March 27.

Death of a Celebrated Dog.—On Saturday morning, whil-t the 1st battalion Scots Fusilier Guards were returning to their barracks, accompanied as usual by their celebrated dog "Bob," he was run over by a cart and killed. "Bob" sailed in the Simoom with the regiment to Malta in 1854, and on the declaration of war proceeded to Scutari. He was present with the regiment to which he was attached at the landing in the Crimea, and at the battle of Alma, where he was returned amongst the list of "missing." After the flank march, however, to Balaclava he again joined, after an absence of three days. He was present at the Light Cavalry charge at Balaclava, at Inkerman, and served in the trenches, and at length was at the final capture of Sebastopol. "Bob" returned with his regiment at the close of the war, and marched into London at the head of his corps. "Bob" had been awarded a medal for his services, which he wore round his neck as a memento and decoration.

SIR HOWARD DOUGLAS ON SIEGE OPERATIONS AND THE NATIONAL DEFENCES.*

AFTER nearly half a century of peace Sir Howard Douglas sees occasion in the present juncture of European affairs to reproduce a work published that lapse of time ago, in which he considers the systems of fortification, and of siege and attack then adopted, having especial regard to the important question of the relative advantages of attack and defence as modified by them. He also appends, what is of more immediate interest to ourselves, "a tract upon the means of naval, littoral, and internal defence of this country in case of invasion."

As within the last few years it has been our duty to treat so largely of military operations, and as, by the agency of the press, the general community of this country have become gradually indoctrinated into the mysteries of warfare, of which they were formerly profoundly ignorant, and because we consider that this knowledge of the horrible penalties and complicated difficulties attendant upon military operations will tend, through the influence of public opinion, to dissuade nations from rushing into hostilities, we propose to devote some attention to a subject which, under other considerations, we should have cast aside as one of a purely technical character and professional interest.

The first and largest portion of this volume is that treating of the modern systems of fortification, more especially that of M. Carnot, and a comparison between the polygonal and the old bastion system; and the occasion for the adoption of the new system, and the purpose it was intended to effect, are not a little interesting in an historical point of view. Under the bastion system the attack had always the superiority over the defence, insomuch that the reduction of any place adequately invested was only a question of days, nay hours, to be calculated beforehand with nicety. The truth of this was acknowledged and proved by Vauban himself, the great perfecter of the bastion system; but the relative disparity of attack and defence has been greatly increased since his time through the improvements in the construction of artillery, by which their range has been increased to such an extent as to overleap the successive lines of outworks by which the approach to the enceinte was formerly defended, and to render a new system of defence necessary.

This fact, so important now, was important even in the first Napoleon's day, though not to the same extent. The circumstance, however, of that great conqueror's having established almost universal dominion over the western and central portions of Europe, and, being in possession of all the principal fortified places, rendered it of importance, before he could carry his operations further east, that he should establish a strong and certain system of defence for the garrisons which he left behind him. It was upon this occasion that M. Carnot was employed to report upon the subject, and to recommend a system of defence which should be perfect, or nearly so.

M. Carnot's system, divested of technical detail, may be described as consisting of two principles—first, the establishment of casemated instead of, or in combination with, open batteries and, secondly, in the general employment of vertical fire, meaning a discharge of shot from guns or small arms at considerable angles of elevation to fall down in a shower upon the enemy so as to destroy them when at work in the trenches. The latter discovery when it first made its appearance created a considerable sensation, the more so from the exciting observations of the author of it, who wrote, "From what we have just read results, I think, very evidently this tranquilising truth—that the barriers of the French empire are absolutely inexpugnable by any Power, or coalition of Powers, whatever, if well defended."

Sir Howard Douglas, however, was not tardy in standing boldly forward to investigate the case in all its bearings, and established, to the satisfaction of the Duke of Wellington, General Jones, and other authorities, that the supposed inexpressibility was fallacious. With respect to the detached wall, upon which M. Carnot's system of defence mainly depended, he showed (by experiment) that it could be breached at any part, even though unseen, by heavy guns or howitzers placed in the first or second parallel and we need hardly say that, if this was true in 1819, how much more so will it be now with the Armstrong gun at our command. But as for the vertical fire, resulting in a pluie de bals poured by the garrison upon the besiegers, the English General demolishes its pretensions even still more signally. He shows that the momentum of a falling shot, though theoretically equal to the force of projection, is practically so diminished by the resistance of the air through which it has to pass that "4-oz. iron balls, or cubical planes of iron of one inch (Fr.) side cannot in descending from the vertex of a very elevated curve acquire velocity sufficient to give a mortal blow, except on an uncovered head, and that the effect of musketry under such circumstances would be almost harmless." These considerations, dry and technical as they appear on paper, teem with suggestions to the observer of events, and prepare one for a complete revolution in the art and chances of war whenever that calamity shall revisit the world.

Of more immediate interest, in a speculative sense, though, we trust, far remote in practical import, are the author's observations on "the naval, littoral, and national defence of England." We may observe that the General is rather an alarmist, probably from old associations and an inherent jealousy and distrust of the policy of the present ruler of France. It is satisfactory, however, to add that, though he seems to look upon an invasion of England as a contingency quite within the chapter of probabilities, he is by no means desponding as to our ability to resist any such attack, and he enters minutely into the description of "a mixed system of defence which he could venture to offer as a practical measure for the security of an insular, maritime, and military power like that of Great Britain." Of our resources first in importance is our Navy, the efficiency of which, now that the system of impressment has been given up, he sees considerably marred by the difficulty of obtaining hands; for which reason he states: "We should keep up, without reference to what any other nations may do, a large standing, active navy, fully manned with well-trained gunners and seamen, with reserves to boot; and then we might concede to constitutional scruples, and the objections of the economists, the folly of keeping up likewise a large standing army, provided always that the militia force is complete on paper, ready to be called out, and that all our scientific corps and appurtenances—which, like the fleet, require well-skilled men—are well kept up, and we might carry the savings to the account of the Navy Estimates." Towards encouraging the manning of the fleet he proposes to abolish corporal punishment except when awarded by court-martial, and to restore prize-money from captures made at sea. This mention of prize-money naturally recalls the reprehensible act of the abandonment of our belligerent rights made by a too-complacent Minister at the late Congress of Paris, the consequence of which will be felt with fatal effect whenever this country shall happen to be engaged in a naval war.

Admitting a descent upon our coasts to be feasible, the author next insists upon the importance of the establishment of movable batteries, to be brought to bear at any required point by means of railways; and he cites an observation which fell from the Duke of Wellington at the time of the invasion panic about the time of the accession of the present Emperor of the French to the Presidency: "His Grace being at Seabrooke, between Sandgate and Hythe, conversing with his Staff and other officers, the principles of permanent camps and other fixed defences became the subject of discussion, when the Duke used the following expressions:—'Look at those splendid heights all along this coast; give me communications which admit of rapid flank movement along those heights and I might set anything at defiance.'"

Colonel Adair, in a lecture recently delivered at the United Service Institution, argued that the Militia force of this country are capable of making an effective resistance against an invading enemy. Sir Howard can only admit of the services of the militia in co-operation with the regular army; and he declares "It cannot be too strongly put that, with such an army (militia and regulars) in the field, in addition to her other means of defence, England is safe." This is consolatory enough: but he insists further, that in order to bring the militia to a proper state of efficiency, the present system of annual training for twenty-eight days should be discontinued, and that instead of it portions of militia troops, in rotation, should be embodied during periods of at least two years.

With regard to works of fortification, he considers that the great naval arsenals, as Portsmouth and Plymouth, should be permanently fortified, but that few inland towns will require more than such detached works as may render the place an intrenched position, to afford temporary protection pending the arrival of reinforcements. Woolwich is pointed to as a danger and "monstrous evil." Arsenal, foundry, and manufactory of all descriptions of arms and warlike implements, it is wholly unprotected from an invading enemy, who could easily plunder it for means of attack upon the metropolis. On the other hand, the idea of fortifying Woolwich is too extravagant to be admitted, requiring, as it would, a series of works covering remote and extensive heights on both sides of the Thames, leading to a waste both of men and money. As the only remedy Sir Howard enforces the necessity that the Woolwich Arsenal should be given up, and a central arsenal formed at Weedon, or some other central point or points from which railways radiate in every direction, to afford protection to the metropolis.

In addition to the above-described provisions, "forts and fixed batteries must be constructed for the defence of all the great commercial cities and communities throughout the kingdom, particularly on the Mersey, the Clyde, the Tyne, and the Forth." These should be armed with the powerful ordnance of the present day, and should be manned with volunteer gunners, in order leave available for the defences of the naval arsenals, harbours, and roadsteads, and for the service of the army in the field, all the well-trained artillerymen of the service. "Thus prepared in all respects," concludes the writer, "the coast of Britain will be unapproachable, her shores inexpugnable, the interior of the country impenetrable by a foe, and England be made invincible."

Carnot, and a Comparison of the Polygonal with the Bastion System; to which are added Some Reflections on Intrenched Positions, and a Tract on the Naval, Littoral, and Internal Defence of England." THE WHITWORTH ORDNANCE.

A trial was made on the sands at Ainsdale Point, about four miles from Southport, on Wednesday and Thursday, last week, of the Whitworth rifled cannon. There was a good attendance of scientific gentlemen at the trial, together with some military officers, amongst whom was Sir John Burgoyne. The trials were, on the whole, satisfactory.

A short distance (says the report in the Manchester Examiner) from the main shore, and upon the flat but not very dry beach, five cannons are ranged upon suitable carriages, with their muzzles pointed to the westward. A target is erected at one thousand yards, and a direct line beyond it is marked out with posts and cordage, bounded by a flag, some eight or nine miles away, visible only through a telescope. One gun is an 80-pounder, and it certainly presents something like the substantial aspect which one naturally expects when we hear of "heavy" ordnance; but the others—an 18-pounder, a 12-pounder, and two 3-pounders—look so thin and slender for their length as at once to suggest to the mind either that powder must have grown weaker, or metal has grown stronger. A slight examination of the beautifully smooth surface and fine grain of the material will soon furnish the explanation, and lead to the conclusion that if they do burst it can only be by a mighty amount of force.

The pitch of rifling in the Whitworth large gun is one turn in 100 in.; the Armstrong (according to the accounts published) has a turn in 126 inches. Mr. Whitworth's experiments have led him to the conclusion (as indicated in his paper on rifled firearms) that the amount of turn should be as quick as practicable, since the true extent of steady flight, in the case of a long projectile, depends upon the rotation given to it. Perhaps the greatest visible difference is in the breech. It is the most important part of the gun, and the most difficult intelligibly to describe. There is no "slot" to lift out at the top (as in the Armstrong), nor in fact anything wholly to detach; nor is the charge put in at the back through a hollow screw, although it is inserted at that part. The breech is a massive piece of metal, which works upon a powerful hinge, or swivel, projecting two or three inches on the right side; and upon this hinge the breech, or at least the back extremity of it, opens out, similarly to a furnace-door. You then see, in the thus exposed bore in the centre, a tin canister, which contained the last charge of powder. It has not burst, because the interior surface of the gun supported it; a little expansion, however, under the force of explosion, has made it fit rather tightly, and it requires a smart pull to draw it out. You can then look through the whole interior and see the beautiful and regular windings which give the rotary motion to the missile while on its way to the muzzle, and the retention of which is essential to its steady flight. To show the process of loading will perhaps convey the best idea of the mechanical arrangement of the breech. The movable back being opened, the longitudinal shot is pushed into the bore, and it, of course, slightly revolves as it disappears. A tin canister (which similarly fits the rifling), filled with powder, varying in length according to the weight of the charge, is pushed in behind the ball. At the end of it, next the missile, it is hermetically sealed with a wad, about half an inch thick, composed of wax and tallow. This, while it preserves the powder from damp, serves the important purpose of a lubricant. The powder-canister is not (and cannot be) pushed wholly into the bore, but projects from the smooth and massive end of the gun about an inch, and in the centre of the movable back there is an indentation to this extent, to receive the projecting part. One object of this projection of the canister is to furnish firm hold of it, after discharge, and thus to facilitate its withdrawal. This is done by a light instrument, which grasps it round, something like a pair of callipers, and is itself very ingenious. When the circles (or rather two half circles) are placed round the end of the canister, the handle points upwards, and by taking hold of it, so as to bring it into a horizontal position, a cam presses the two half-circles together, and, at the same moment, two inclined planes act as levers against the end of the gun for extracting the empty cartridge.

The charge being duly placed, the back or breech being pressed to, a handle in the centre of it is turned round rather under than over three times—the work of a second or two—and the breech and the barrel are one. The simple and efficient method by which this is accomplished is the wonder of every beholder. The massive back turns in an outer ring, and this ring it is to which the hinge is attached—it acts, in fact, as a sort of crane for the loose breech, guiding it to its place when the junction for firing is to be made. Round the thick end of the gun are half-a-dozen strong screw threads, each half an inch thick, and the movable back having corresponding ones in its inner surface, the turning of the central handle brings the two into close and firm contact. Two small apertures are made for the escape of the air, which would otherwise be compressed in the screwing up, for Mr. Whitworth's workmanship does not allow of the escape of even air, except by a special channel. The old plan of a touchhole on the top is disused, and the friction-fuse substituted. This is a little copper tube, about three inches long, and the eighth of an inch thick. It is inserted in an opening precisely in the centre of the back, and is ignited by the friction which results from detaching a portion of it upon a string being pulled. It discharges its contents against a minute aperture opposite to it in the rear end of the tin cartridge, and thus fires the gun.

Thursday was appointed for a special trial. Amongst those present were Sir John Burgoyne, Inspector of Fortifications; Colonel Campbell, Hon. Captain Wrottesley, Colonel Wolford, Captain Elgee, Mr. Lilley, Messrs. E. R. Langworthy, Wm. Entwisle, Thomas Fairbairn, and others. The day was beautifully fine, with a cold northerly wind, blowing frequently in gusts. Firing was commenced with a 3-pounder, charged with 8oz. of powder. At an elevation of thirty-five degrees it obtained an extreme range of 9688 yards, the deflection of the missile being thirty-eight yards to the right; at an elevation of twenty degrees, the range obtained was 7073 yards, the deflection being only four yards to the right. The 80-pounder, at five degrees elevation, with 12lb. of powder, threw a 90lb. projectile a distance of 2550 yards, when it ricocheted at right angles, and buried itself in the sea at an immense distance. A second shot, with the same charge, first grazed the sand 2620 yards distant from the gun, and only two to the right of the true line; from this point it glanced upwards, but continued a straight course onward, alighting in the sand at a distance of over 6000 yards from the gun. Had this piece been mounted so as to permit of its being fired at a high degree of elevation, there is not the least doubt but that it would have thrown its ponderous shot a distance of 8000 or 10,000 yards.

We intend to give an Illustration in connection with these deeply-interesting experiments, which have been resumed this week.

LETTERS FOR THE BRITISH FORCES SERVING IN CHINA.—The French Government having offered to reduce the transit charge upon letters addressed to officers, soldiers, and seamen of the British forces in China, when sent viâ Marseilles, to the same amount that is levied in France upon letters addressed to French soldiers and seamen serving in China, which is 2d. for a letter not exceeding a quarter of an ounce in weight, and 4d. for a letter above a quarter and not exceeding half an ounce, the following will be the combined British and French postage, to be paid in advance, during the continuance of hostilities with China, upon such correspondence, viz:—For a letter not exceeding a quarter of an ounce, addressed to a commissioned or warrant officer of the Army or Navy, 8d.; not exceeding half an ounce, 10d. To a non-commissioned officer or private soldier or seamen, not exceeding a quarter of an ounce, 3d.; not exceeding half an ounce, 5d. The privilege enjoyed by private soldiers and seamen of sending and receiving their letters by British packet for a postage of one penny will, in addition, continue in full force. Letters addressed to non-commissioned officers, soldiers, or seamen serving in China will be forwarded through France only when specially addressed "viâ Marseilles." Letters addressed to commissioned or warrant officers will be forwarded as a rule viâ Marseilles, when not directed to be sent "viâ Southampton."—General Post Office, Feb. 21.

ALLEGED FRAUDS IN THE LONDON DOCKS.

The seven-day cause of Morgan and Another v. the London Dock Company was resumed on Tuesday in the Court of Exchequer, before Baron Martin, and brought to a conclusion. A full report of the trial would fill an octavo volume; we are, therefore, necessarily restricted to the giving of a bare outline of the case.

The declaration stated that the plaintiffs had at various times delivered to the defendants certain wines, contained in pipes and casks, to be safely and securely kept by them for reward, yet afterwards, through the non-performance by the defendants of their duty, the wines contained in the pipes and casks became and were much adulterated and deteriorated in quality, and that large quantities of the wines contained in the said pipes and casks leaked away, or were drawn off, or became lost to the plaintiffs, and thereby large quantities of the said wines have become less valuable, and useless to the plaintiffs, and the brand, credit, and reputation of the plaintiffs in their trade and business as importers and sellers of wine became and are much injured, and the plaintiffs have been prevented from selling large quantities of wine.

The defendants pleaded "Not Guilty," and that they did not receive the wines upon the terms alleged.

The plaintiffs are wine-merchants in Savage-gardens, and represent a house which has existed in the wine trade for upwards of 100 years. In October, 1853, and from that time up to July, 1855, they had deposited port wines, shipped by the Heber, the Monteiro the First, the Tweed, and the Dora, in the east vault of the London Docks. Large quantities of these wines, consisting of small portions of separate marks of each shipment, having been found to be deteriorated, the plaintiffs made a claim against the defendants, alleging that the deterioration had been caused while in the east vault by the acts of the servants employed there. It was proved to be the custom of the company to pay for all deficiencies in casks when delivered out exceeding one gallon per pipe per annum. It was shown that several of the plaintiffs' pipes, when regauged after an interval of four or five years from the time of their deposit, showed no diminution of quantity whatever, notwithstanding that many samples had been taken from them. A commission to examine witnesses was sent out to Oporto, and samples of the wine as exported were brought over to this country and produced in court. Samples were also produced by several persons to whom the defendants had sold some of the wines of the same marks and shipments as those complained of; and the plaintiffs' witnesses—Mr. Wood, of Bond-street, Mr. Portal, Mr. Bell, and Mr. Tuke—tasted the wines so produced, comparing the Oporto samples and the English samples with the dock samples, and severally expressed opinions as to the various parcels of the wines that natural causes could not have altered the character of the Oporto and English samples so as to transmute them into the dock samples, and Mr. Norman obtaining from the witnesses that the peculiar darkness of the colour could not be the result of natural causes, Mr. Tuke in one instance stating, in answer to a question from the learned Judge, that he believed that some other wine must have been introduced into the pipes.

Several coopers employed in the vault deposed on behalf of the plaintiffs that, prior to the discovery of what was called in court the "Osborn fraud," a custom prevailed in the docks of filling up each cask with a crane and can to the required standard, less the usual one gallon per annum; and it was suggested that the plaintiffs' pipes and casks had been filled up in this manner with new and inferior wines, and hence the deterioration complained of. The loss-books of the company, showing the losses in the east vault, were put in evidence, by which it appeared that the plaintiffs' loss on their stock of wine deposited in their names in 1852 was six gallons on two pipes; in 1853, seven gallons on two pipes; in 1854, 18 gallons on two pipes; in 1855, 256 gallons; and, in 1856, 311 gallons. The general losses on all the wines in the east vault belonging to the merchants who deposited there, exceeding one gallon per annum for the three years from 1852 to 1854, varied from 629 to 669 gallons, increasing, in the year 1855, to 3427 gallons. The plaintiffs by the present action sought to recover about £2800 for the deterioration of their wines.

On the part of the defendants several of the persons in authority at the docks were called, and swore that it was impossible for wines to be drawn from one cask and put into another, as the watch employed by the company for the protection of the merchant was both numerous and vigilant, and that the Customs as well as themselves had a lock on the vault doors, and that no person was employed without making a strict search into his character; and, in fact, that the company used every exertion to procure the services of honest people; and that in December, 1854, they had discharged all the coopers who had been employed in the east vault at the time of the Osborn fraud. The vault keepers, the assistant vault-keepers, the coopers of every denomination, watchmen, lamplighters, labourers, and custom-house officers denied all knowledge of the use of the can and crane for the purposes as stated in the plaintiffs' case.

Some of the coopers, when under the sharp fire of Mr. James's cross-examination, said that some water had been put into a vat of sherry belonging to Messrs. Ray, which the company had been compelled to pay for, and which was afterwards sold at their sale. Another admitted that he had put some sherry into a quarter-cask of muscatel belonging to a Mr. Dyer, a wine-merchant, who, on being called, said that he thought it had been a mistake, and that he therefore made no complaint. The master cooper of the docks admitted that he might have been told of a man who was going to put two gallons of port into some sherry, and might have said that he was a fool for doing so.

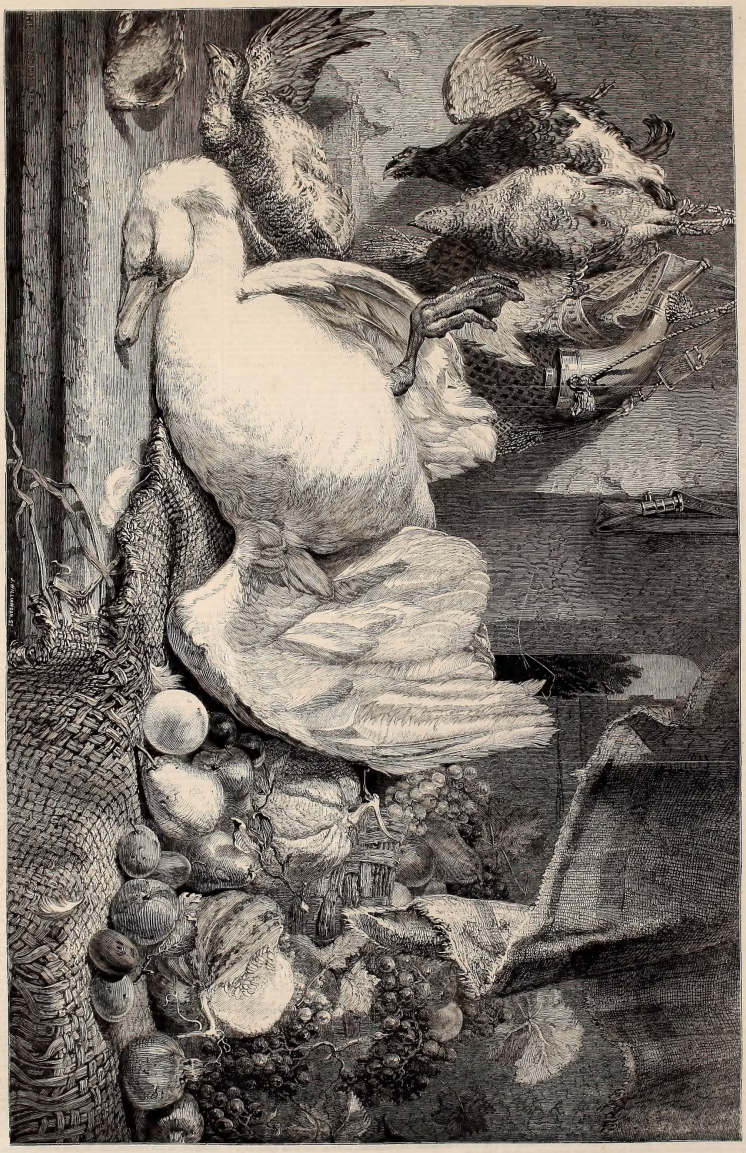
Substantially, the defence was that the vintage of 1851, which at that time enjoyed a very high reputation, was affected by a disease called the oïdium, which first began to affect the grape in 1849, but did not fully manifest itself in Portugal until 1853; that the wines of the vintage of 1851 were deficient in natural alcohol, and that unless bottled in three or four years, or fortified with brandy, they would not keep, but turn acid; and that wines should be from time to time racked with the lees; and it was proved that the plaintiffs were not in the habit of racking or adding brandy to their wines.

Custom-house officers were called, who stated that they had known wines, though sampled and tasted, show no diminution when regauged after a considerable interval; and some wine-merchants were called who swore that they had known wines when left on the lees increase in colour. It was shown that of late years it was very much the practice to vat wines—that is, to pour several wines into a vat and blend them together, adding large quantities of brandy; and that the Customs had, with a view to this practice, or necessity, or whatever it may be called, allowed wine to contain 40 per cent of spirit.

The Superintendent of the Docks swore that he had never heard of the custom of making up the deficiencies, and did not now believe that such a custom did prevail.

It was proved that the plaintiffs' wines were a very considerable distance from the loophole through which wines are taken in and put out of the vault; it having been suggested by the plaintiffs' witnesses that wines were taken from casks close to the loophole to fill up deficient casks when going up.

After the examination of Mr. Gassiot, one of the directors of the company, who gave a very interesting account of the mode of conducting the business of the lodge or wine store in Oporto, and of blending wines for shipment, so as to ensure the perfect uniformity of each cask of the same mark and shipment, the counsel on both sides withdrew for some short time, and upon re-entering the court the case arrived at a termination by the withdrawal of a juror, his Lordship remarking that the plaintiffs and their friends had given their evidence in a very candid and honourable manner, and no doubt believed that the plaintiffs' claim was perfectly well founded; and, on the other hand, that the London Dock Company had acted with perfect good faith in resisting the plaintiffs' claim upon them. His Lordship added that he had never known a case in which it was more difficult to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. Handsome things were said by the leading counsel on either side, and so this case ended.



We ought to have stated that the Osborn fraud consisted in twenty-two pipes of Italian or Spanish red wine purchased at the rummage sales, and, being deposited in the east vault, changing in a peculiar manner into very excellent port wine. The Dock Company said that the fraud had been effected, not by the interchange of wine from cask to cask, but by getting rid of the wine from Osborn's casks by some undiscovered means, and filling them up by pilfering from good port-wine casks.

SHIPWRECK AND LOSS OF UPWARDS OF 100 LIVES.—During the heavy north-westerly gale on Sunday evening the American ship Luna, 623 tons, Capt. Warkmeister, which only left Havre early that morning for New Orleans, with nearly a hundred emigrants and a crew of twenty-four hands, was totally lost on the rocks of Barfleur, to the eastward of Cherbourg, and the whole of her living freight (with the exception of two) met with a watery grave. The Luna belonged to Baltimore.

THE SHREWSBURY ESTATES.—In the Court of Exchequer Chamber last Saturday the Lord Chief Baron gave judgment in the case Earl of Shrewsbury and Talbot v. Hope Scott and others. The late Earl of Shrewsbury by will demised the house and lands known as Alton Towers, in Staffordshire, to the defendants in trust for the son of the Duke of Norfolk. The plaintiff, who had established his right to the title, also claimed the estate in question, contending that, as heir to the title, he was also heir of, and entitled to, the Alton Towers estate. An action of ejectment was accordingly brought against the defendants, the trustees under the will, and, as the case rested entirely upon documentary evidence, a verdict was taken for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the Court above. The case was accordingly argued in banco, and at the conclusion the Court unanimously gave their judgment for the plaintiff. The case was then removed by writ of error into this court, and the case was again elaborately argued by Mr. Serjeant Shee, the Attorney-General, and other learned counsel, for the defendants, the Court intimating that Sir F. Kelly, for the plaintiff, need not then address them on the arguments urged on the other side, but that if the Court wished to hear him they would let him know. The learned counsel was not called upon, and the Lord Chief Baron delivered the unanimous judgment of the Court in affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, and the plaintiff's right to the property. Judgment for the plaintiff accordingly.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Monday.

Volunteer Corps.—A conversation took place between Lord Vivian and Earl De Grey and Ripon, in which the former urged that regular adjutants should not be appointed to rifle corps, but their duties discharged by the adjutants of militia; and the latter showed that such a course was indispensable to the proper forming of the corps into battalions.

Delhi Prize-money.—Lord Berners obtained from the Duke of Argyll an explanation of the delay which had taken place in the payment of the prize-money taken at Delhi.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

The Earl of Derby asked a question as to the mode in which the Government proposed to carry into effect the 20th article of the treaty with France, which provided that the treaty should not be valid unless her Britannic Majesty should be authorised by the assent of her Parliament to execute any engagements contracted by her in its articles. He urged that the treaty was anything but in consonance with free-trade principles. He could not understand why there had been such a secret made of the selection of Mr. Cobden as one of the negotiators of the treaty. The Government had been guilty of undue precipitancy in concluding the treaty, and had made an attempt to take Parliament and the country by surprise with regard to it. He also argued that they should have followed the precedent set by Mr. Pitt in 1786, and have given Parliament every facility and every information necessary for the full and accurate consideration of the treaty, and formally obtained from Parliament the assent specified in the 20th article. He moved for the production of certain papers connected with the treaty, his object being to give the House an opportunity of expressing their opinion with regard to it.

Earl Granville pointed out the different circumstances under which Mr. Pitt's treaty was brought forward to those of that which was now in discussion, and urged that the Government had pursued a proper and constitutional course, following the precedent of Mr. Pitt in every respect, except in such points as were inconsistent with the necessities of the present moment. The fullest opportunity would be given for discussing the treaty.

Earl Grey complained that the precedent of Mr. Pitt alluded to had not been followed, for when any of the resolutions on the customs duties were passed by the House of Commons they came into operation immediately; and their Lordships' House, if they had to discuss the treaty afterwards, could not deal with its provisions with any effect, inasmuch as they could not alter any financial arrangements made by the other House, whereas, in his opinion, the treaty ought not to receive the sanction of Parliament without its undergoing considerable modification.

After some observations in reply by the Duke of Argyll, and some remarks from the Earl of Hardwicke, the motion was withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Monday.

Neapolitan Tribunals.—In answer to Mr. T. Duncombe, Lord J. Russell said, with reference to the case of Giovanni Porpa, a naturalised British subject, who had been imprisoned at Naples, Lord Malmesbury declined to interfere, because the person in question was a born subject of the King of Naples.

The New Bronze Coinage.—In answer to Mr. W. Ewart, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the delay in the issue of the new bronze coin was caused by the care which was required in the execution of the designs.

Wine and Beer Licenses.—In answer to Mr. E. James, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, in reference to the giving wine and beer licenses to eating-house-keepers, that it had been represented to him by a deputation of licensed victuallers that no change was necessary in the trade in strong liquors, but it had also been said at the same time that all persons who had spirit licenses should be compelled to take out wine licenses. He stated that he thought it was not desirable to leave the trade in its present unsatisfactory state. Still the details of his proposal were open to consideration, and would receive such consideration, and ample notice would be given before any step was taken in the matter.

THE TREATY OF COMMERCE.—DEFEAT OF MR. DISRAELI'S AMENDMENT.

On the motion for going into Committee on the Customs Act, Mr. Du Cane, who had a motion on the paper impeaching the principle of the Budget, postponed it until after that which was then proposed by

Mr. Disraeli: "That this House does not think fit to go into Committee on the Customs Acts, with a view to the reduction or repeal of the duties referred to in the treaty of commerce between her Majesty and the Emperor of the French until it shall have considered and assented to the engagements in that treaty." He commenced by saying that the general principles of the financial plan of the Government being wrong in the unanimous opinion of his party, they felt it to be their duty not to attempt to foil the Government on any question of detail, but to oppose it on a clear straightforward issue. This was raised by Mr. Du Cane's notice of motion, but in consequence of the conversation on Friday evening with regard to the mode in which the treaty of commerce was to be introduced to the House, which produced so ambiguous an answer from the Government, he had brought forward his notice, and without conferring with any one of his party, except Sir Hugh Cairns, he had determined to call attention to the unprecedented position in which the House was placed on this subject. By the form in which the business of the House had been arranged, the treaty of commerce with France could never have come before the House; for, when once the resolutions on the Customs Acts were agreed to, the articles of the treaty were, in fact, ratified. If that was so, how could the House deal with those articles of the treaty which had nothing to do with customs duties, and especially the 11th article, in which an engagement was entered into that there should be no export duty on coal? In what way was the treaty to be brought before the House? Was an address to the Crown to be moved, signifying the assent of the House to its provisions? It was not usual for the House to make such an address except in answer to a communication from the Crown. But if a message from the Crown, laying the treaty before the House, was brought down, after the Committee on customs was over, it would be simply a mockery to the Queen and an insult to Parliament. There was a precedent with regard to the mode of proceeding in the proceedings on the treaty of commerce with France in 1786. It was concluded in September, and published. When Parliament met, it was brought up by Mr. Pitt on the 2nd of February, with notice that it would be taken into consideration on the 12th. Mr. Fox protested against so short a notice, although it had been publicly known and discussed out of doors for four months. In the present case the provisions of the treaty were only known for a less time than that proposed by Mr. Pitt. On the 12th of February Mr. Pitt brought forward the treaty, and proposed general resolutions embodying its provisions. The resolutions when agreed to were sent by Mr. Pitt to the House of Lords for their consideration; and the two Houses presented a joint address to the Crown. The resolutions were afterwards considered in Committee on the Customs Act. Mr. Pitt in that Committee carried a great measure of financial reform, involving no less than three thousand resolutions; but he mixed up with it neither the treaty of commerce or his financial plans, but brought forward his Budget after he had carried his plan of financial reform. He (Mr. Disraeli) was of opinion that it was an unfortunate thing to have selected Mr. Cobden as the secret negotiator of the treaty; and he traced in it marks of the idiosyncrasy of the negotiator—as, for instance, in the reduction of sources of revenue which Mr. Cobden was prepared to meet by reduction of expenditure—a principle which had not been adopted by the Government. Then as to the form of the treaty. If it was a reciprocity treaty, reciprocity was never less adroitly managed; but if it was he could find no cause for its being managed as it was. He urged that the Government should not force a division on the points he had submitted, but should give the House its legitimate opportunity of considering the treaty, and which they could still do with honour and dignity.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (who was received with cheers) said that Mr. Disraeli had dealt in strictness with a question of procedure, and he did not see that it was consistent with a discussion on such a question to criticise the competency and character of Mr. Cobden as the negotiator of the treaty. He ridiculed Mr. Disraeli's attributing to the Government a course which had caused the Queen to commit an illegal act, and was an attack on the constitutional privileges of the House of Commons, and repudiated the charitable protection of inadvertence offered to them by the leader of the Opposition—as he rejected his proposition. He asserted that Mr. Disraeli was wrong both in his facts and his arguments with regard to the course taken by Mr. Pitt in 1786. He read one of Mr. Pitt's resolutions which had been alluded to, and showed that they were not large and general, but specific and precise. The resolutions were not submitted to a Committee on customs, but one on simplifying the public accounts. As to the article relating to coals, it did not interfere in the least with the right to forbid their export as contraband of war. As to the motion itself, he did not know what it meant, and he believed Mr. Disraeli himself did not know what it meant. By the 14th article it was provided that the treaty should be in force when Parliament had given the necessary legislative sanction, which was the passing of the Act of Parliament which settled that part of it which related to England, and the 20th article only referred to its ratification as regarded France. The motion, if it meant anything, meant that the House should pass a specific assent to each article of the treaty. So far from withdrawing the treaty from the consideration of the House, the precedent of Mr. Pitt had been followed in every respect, except such as the altered circumstances of the times required. It was not the custom to make known treaties of commerce to the House by message from the Crown. The discussion in hand was simply puerile. The course taken by the Government was founded simply on the necessity of dispatch in matters connected with the trade and commerce of the country, and they proposed to bring before Parliament in a direct form all the provisions of the treaty which required legislative sanction. It was the intention of the Government, if the House adopted those portions of the treaty which required legislative sanction, to submit it as a whole for its assent. The object of the Government was simply to put an end to all exclusive legislation, and to consult as much as possible the public convenience. This, he contended, they had done in combining the consideration of the treaty and the financial plan.

Sir H. Cairns followed, generally reiterating Mr. Disraeli's arguments, but giving them a more legal aspect.

Sir R. Bethell also entered into the law of the question, replying to Sir H. Cairns, contending that he had only added to the erroneous conclusions of Mr. Disraeli.

Sir F. Kelly and Mr. Newdegate having spoken in favour of Mr. Disraeli's motion,

Mr. Ayrton signified his intention of voting for it.

Mr. Malins followed on the same side.

Mr. Bright said from the animated manner of the hon. gentleman who had just sat down a stranger might have supposed that the House was discussing a great question. He could not himself understand what they were discussing. Why did not gentlemen opposite at once say that they thought the treaty was a bad thing, instead of indirect carpings at it in and out of the House? If they were against it, why not bring forward a resolution directly asserting that opinion? They could not exaggerate the importance of the question involved, and one deserving of a great debate, and should not be treated by means of such motions as that before the House. Great interests were involved in this question, and it ought not to be made the stalking-horse of party, or the subject of indefinite motions. By taking a course which would have ensured the adoption of the treaty as a whole, the result would have been that the House would have been absolutely shut out from considering in Committee on the Customs Acts a single duty which was dealt with by its provisions. Gentlemen opposite had little idea of the suffering and uncertainty which suspense on questions like this caused in the country, and demanded an immediate and definite decision on the subject on the part of the House.

Mr. S. Fitzgerald protested against the reply of Mr. Gladstone to Mr. Disraeli as characterised by more unfairness and misrepresentation than any speech he had ever heard in that House. He then, with no marked variation, repeated the arguments which had been used on the side of the question which he advocated, except a passing sneer at Lord J. Russell's capacity for the conduct of foreign affairs may be so considered.

Lord J. Russell said that it was only from the two last speeches on the other side of the House that he understood that the scope and object of the motion was a consideration of and discussion on every article of the treaty, a course which would be inconsistent with the prerogative of the Crown, and that proposition came from a party calling itself Conservative. It was claiming a right larger than that exercised by the Senate of the United States. Mr. Pitt, in 1786, did not submit all the articles of his treaty to the House, but only those which required the assent of Parliament. The course adopted by the Government now was the only plain and rational course which they could pursue. Referring to the article on coal, which had been used as an argument as if it contained a secret intention of war on the part of France, he objected to such incessant intimations of the warlike intentions of that country against England; and expressed his belief that the treaty originated in the opinion entertained by the Emperor of the power of free trade to make France as prosperous and happy in peace as he desired to see her strong and prepared for war. He believed, too, that ere long that portion of the people of France who were most in favour of prohibition would see the advantage of a system which was founded on the principles of free trade. He indignantly protested against a small and undefined attack on a great measure which, if at all, should receive a fair, open, straightforward, and manly opposition.

Mr. Horsman expressed his surprise at the definition which had been given that night of the 20th article of the treaty. Every provision of that treaty carried with it great political consequences and responsibilities, and yet that instrument was not produced to the House, and its freedom of discussion was so far circumscribed. Having gone minutely through the details of the precedent of Mr. Pitt's treaty in 1786, which had been already so often dwelt upon, he urged that the proceedings in that case formed a painful contrast with the secrecy of negotiation, the secrecy of execution and delay until after the Budget of the present treaty, which he thought gave rise to a suspicion of the existence of some point in it which it was thought would not bear the light. It might tend to the giving of a new source of strength to a great military power, which might hereafter be used for purposes which England would be unable to control. They were all anxious to assist the Chancellor of the Exchequer in providing for the wants of the year, and in promoting a good understanding with France so far as was consistent with the interests of England and the maintenance of friendly relations with other nations, but it was not desirable to go further. The deficit in the revenue was partly caused by the treaty; and the question was whether the treaty was worth it; and therefore it ought to be first considered by the House. Why was it not manfully produced and the opinion of the House asked upon it? It was his belief that it was only a screen and a cloak for those immense armaments which we were obliged to rival, and only a portion of the hollow and disingenuous alliance with France which did little or nothing towards the preservation of peace. (The right hon. gentleman spoke for a considerable time, and was loudly cheered throughout by the Opposition.)

Lord Palmerston would not have taken part in the debate but for the speech that had just been delivered. All the other speeches had been utterly demolished by the addresses of Mr. Gladstone and Lord J. Russell. He vindicated the course taken by the Government, which he thought so clear that he wondered that a division was sought on the present motion, so clearly was it a mistake and an inadvertence. Mr. Horsman, seeing that the Opposition were in great distress, like a good Samaritan, delivered a speech which he had prepared for a different occasion and another phase of the discussion, and, without touching on the motion, dashed into the whole question of the Budget. His arguments went to advocate a system of non-intercourse with France, for anything which tended to make her more prosperous and more industrial was a danger to England. (Mr. Horsman here rose to explain, but Lord Palmerston did not give way for some time; the Opposition loudly cheering Mr. Horsman, and the noble Lord being as loudly cheered on his side.) He should not follow that right hon. gentleman's example of going into the Budget, beyond denying the assertion that it was a falling away from the principles of Sir Robert Peel. The question before the House was only one of procedure, and that alone.

Mr. Bowyer attempted to move the adjournment of the debate, but was met by such loud cries of "Divide!" that he did not persist in his motion.

The House then divided, and there appeared:—

For Mr. Disraeli's motion	230
Against t	293
Majority for the Government ..	—63

Mr. Du Cane stated that he should in Committee next day move a resolution to the effect of that of which he had given notice.

The House then went formally into Committee of Supply.

The other business was disposed of, and the House adjourned shortly before one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—Tuesday.

Fusion of Law and Equity.—A bill was introduced by the Lord Chancellor for the further fusion of law and equity, and read a first time.

Italy.—Earl Granville read a letter from our Chargé d'Affaires at Florence, denying a statement of the Marquis of Normanby that he had attended the reception of Signor Buoncompagni officially.—The Marquis of Normanby declined to accept the distinction drawn by that gentleman between a private and an official reception.—Earl Granville pointed out that it was stated that he had never attended any official reception of Signor Buoncompagni.

Constitution of Tasmania.—The Earl of Carnarvon presented a petition from the inhabitants of Hobart Town, in Tasmania, praying for the disallowance of an Act amending the constitution of the Legislative Council in that country, on the ground that it gave further permanency to the status of the Council, and also restricted the franchise of the electors.—The Earl of Derby presented a similar petition from the clergy of Tasmania against an Act which they asserted interfered with the provision made for religious services, and touched vested interests.—The Duke of Newcastle doubted whether the first petition contained any real and tangible objection to the Act, and it was not proposed to withhold the assent of the Crown to the measure. With regard to the other, it was only the result of a progressive feeling against State endowments of religion in the colony.—After some remarks from Earl Grey and the Lord Chancellor, the subject dropped.

China.—The Earl of Selkirk having moved for certain papers relating to the instructions given to Lord Elgin on his mission to China, the Earl of Elgin referred to statements which had been made in the House of Commons with reference to his conduct of his mission to China. He was never charged by his instructions with the ratification of the Ttreaty of Tien-Tsin, and never had the option of going on to Pekin. He complained of the attacks which had been made on him; and, in a comprehensive review of his proceedings, showed that he had great difficulty to contend with from the first, and after the capture of Canton the troops at his disposal were required in India, and at the same time he was urged to force on the Chinese Government terms which would have amounted to the entire destruction of the commercial system of that country. But for his being called away to the south, in order to attend to English interests at Canton, he should probably have been enabled to go on to Pekin, and there have concluded the treaty, and thus have averted the unfortunate occurrence which had arisen.—After some observations from Lord Colchester, the motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—Tuesday.

The Paper Duty and Income Tax.—Sir W. Miles gave notice that when the resolutions to be proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer were considered he should move the omission of resolution 16, by which it was proposed to abolish the duty on paper, and the alteration of the ninth line in resolution 17, relating to the income tax, by changing 10d. into 9d.

Alleged Bribery at Norwich.—In answer to Mr. E. James, the Attorney-General said that his attention had been called to the case of proceedings at Norwich in regard to the alleged bribery of one Joel Fox, and the refusal of a magistrate to answer questions on the ground that his answers might criminate himself, but he did not propose to proceed by ex-officio information. An indictment, however, had been instituted in the case.

The Treaty with France.—In answer to Mr. E. Ball, Lord Palmerston said the present treaty with France was a complete instrument, but it was open to either party to amend any of its provisions by means of a supplementary treaty.

Order of the Budget.—On the motion that the House at its rising should adjourn to two o'clock to-morrow, it being Ash-Wednesday, Sir J. Graham drew attention to a point of order. He urged that the resolution of Mr. Du Cane was not such a one as could be moved in a Committee of Customs, as it dealt with questions of revenue beyond those connected with the customs duties proper. He suggested that it should be made as a substantive motion before the orders of the day were brought on.—The Speaker said that Sir James Graham was quite correct with regard to the point of order; the resolution must be confined to the subject-matter before a Committee.—Lord Palmerston said he would accede to any arrangement that might be made.—Mr. Du Cane said that his object was to move a resolution which embraced the whole scope of the financial scheme of the Government, and would accept the offer made to him to bring it on as a substantive motion.

AMENDMENT ON THE BUDGET.

The other motions on the paper having been disposed of,

Mr. Du Cane rose to move, "That while the House is desirous to relieve the trade of the country from all duties of customs which can safely be dispensed with, it does not think it expedient to add to the existing deficiency by diminishing the ordinary revenue, and is not prepared to disappoint the just expectations of the country by rendering necessary a large increase of the income tax." He disclaimed being influenced by any factious or party motives, but acted as a purely independent member, who objected to the leading features of the financial plan of the Government on the ground of its being unsound and unjust; that it did not grapple with the financial difficulty, but tended to increase it; that the principal reductions of taxes—viz, on wine and paper—were singularly inopportune at a time when the income tax was higher than it ever had been in time of peace; and, lastly, that it was founded on a one-sided commercial treaty. He proceeded to argue that, looking to the sources from which the present deficiency was met, some of which could not be depended on beyond the year, there would next year be a deficiency of £13,000,000, with which perhaps a new Parliament, elected under a new Reform Act, would have to grapple. They would find, too, an income tax of 10d. in the pound, which they would gladly seize on and make a permanent institution in its most odious form. Referring to the wine duties, he urged that the disease of the vine and other circumstances rendered a reduction of duty inopportune; nor was it calculated to produce a supply of cheap and unadulterated wine, acceptable to the English palate. With regard to the paper duty, he questioned whether the resolution of the House condemnatory of that duty was necessarily binding on a Finance Minister, nor was it such a reduction as would compensate for dear tea and sugar. These were the only questions with which he proposed to deal; and he then proceeded to discuss the treaty with France, denying that it was founded on the principles of free trade or reciprocity. He finished by quoting the concluding words of Mr. Gladstone's speech in 1852, when he called on the House to reject Mr. Disraeli's Budget.

Mr. E. L. Gower followed, defending the principles, and portions of the details, of the financial scheme.

In the discussion which ensued, Lord R. Montagu, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Liddell, Mr. Dodson, Mr. Crossley, Mr. Dawson (who, with Mr. Hennessy, opposed the Budget from an Irish point of view), took part; and, Mr. Duff having addressed the House,

Sir S. Northcote was ready to admit ungrudgingly that there was a great deal of sterling value in the Budget; but it was possible that we might have to pay too dear for the valuable things it contained. With regard to the treaty, he was generally disposed to think that it was in its main principles not inconsistent with free trade; but there were some things in it which rather militated against free trade. Nevertheless, it was certain that it made a breach in the French system of prohibition. It was said that all the advantages to be derived from it were to be obtained at the low price of an addition of one penny to the income tax for one year. But the deficiency which existed might, on the calculation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself, have been made up by an income tax at sevenpence in the pound. He with some elaboration pointed out that this financial scheme was calculated to leave the country in a very serious, if not dangerous, fiscal and political condition.

Mr. Ayrton on this occasion was of opinion that the course taken by the Government in reference to the discussion on the Budget redounded highly to their credit and honour. In the resolution which had been proposed the treaty was not impugned, and it was not open to any one to impugn it by a side-wind; while the question of the imposition of the income tax was distinctly raised, not, however, as regarded the expectations of the people. He contended that the measure before the House could not be complained of as regarded the burden which it imposed on property. He expressed his gratification at the fact of the imposition of the income tax, which he trusted would not soon cease to exist. He opposed the resolution.

Mr. Hubbard moved the adjournment of the debate, which was agreed to. The orders of the day were then disposed of.

OUR NATIONAL DEFENDERS.

(To the Editor of the Illustrated London News.)

Although so much has been already written on the subject of our national defences, I consider that a little more attention may be claimed for and afforded to our national defenders. I allude more especially to the Navy. Notwithstanding the able letters that have appeared in the public journals on the subject of manning the Navy, but little in reality has been done towards effecting that object, principally because the question itself is imperfectly understood. The inducements held out are also decidedly inadequate, as the failure in the attempt to establish a naval reserve fully demonstrates. Manning the Navy and manning the Army are two very different affairs. In the one case the raw material is all that is necessary; in the other something far beyond the raw material is required; but, as the supply of the cultivated article seldom exceeds the ordinary demand for the merchant service alone, it is not very wonderful that in extraordinary emergencies we should find it impossible to obtain such a supply as we suddenly find ourselves to stand in need of. If enough able seamen cannot be found to man the Royal Navy, the number must be made up with ordinary seamen, or even landsmen. Now, as at least three years' servitude afloat is requisite to train an ordinary and from six to seven an able seaman, the difficulty of obtaining at a short notice an adequate supply must, under present arrangements, be much more likely to increase than to diminish.

The only way permanently to remedy this evil is, I conceive, to hold out greater inducements to the rising generation to enter the Royal Navy; and, as a preliminary step, I would advise that a Government order be issued that in all national, free, and charity schools one day in each week (either Wednesday or Saturday, these days being already half-holidays) be set aside for naval and military exercises, filling it up with athletic games and sports. This would not only improve the growth of the boys but would also cultivate a taste for one service or the other, and might be readily accomplished by means of pensioners, naval and military, to whom a slight remuneration would be sufficient inducement, while the extra expense to the country would be a mere trifle.

I would also advise that in every seaport town of any importance training schools for the Navy should be established, where lads from fourteen years of age and upwards should be articled or entered to serve from five to seven years as apprentices to the Government (the first twelvemonth on shore, the remainder afloat). These lads should be provided with good board, lodging, and clothing, with a small amount of pay, to be gradually increased every year, and to be so arranged that during the last year of their servitude the amount should equal the pay of an ordinary seaman. By this means a permanent supply of strong, useful lads might be kept up, ready on any emergency to take their places beside their more mature shipmates, and able to do duty, according to their strength, with credit and intelligence far beyond the general run of volunteers attracted suddenly by the offer of a bounty.

But, to render the Royal Navy popular, it will be necessary to hold out greater inducements than any that have yet been offered. The tide of emigration still sets powerfully from the mother country towards her numerous wealthy colonies; the demand for mechanical and agricultural labour absorbs nearly the whole of our remaining population, and the value of manual labour of all kinds is still steadily increasing. How can we, then, expect the rising generation to choose a profession where the pay is notoriously bad, the living questionable, and the discipline of the very strictest kind, while the greatest reward in perspective for a life spent in the service of the country is a ridiculously small pension, or, by chance, a berth in Greenwich Hospital; the prospect of rising to any distinction under existing regulations being so utterly improbable that the most sanguine youth would never dream of such a thing? But, only let it be known that all barriers to promotion are to be removed; that the highest distinctions will be open to fair competition; that by steady application, good conduct, and a determination to excel in the duties of his profession a young man may calculate upon meeting with due encouragement, and we shall soon find that, instead of the service being shunned, as at present, by the most intelligent portion of the community, we should have a steady supply of volunteers of a much superior grade to those we have hitherto depended upon.

To induce merchant seamen to join the Royal Navy it will be necessary to modify or reform many existing regulations. The punishment of flogging must be abolished altogether; a better rate of pay must be given; and, if a more liberal system of rewards for good conduct, skill, and length of servitude be established, by which means a sailor might clearly see the advantages of joining, there would be a constant supply of volunteers from the one service to the other. At the present time, besides the bounty (to which none but the refuse of the service attach any value), there is nothing to induce a man of sense to enter, but a vast deal to make him reject, the Royal Navy.

Apologising for this intrusion, I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

An Old Sailor Boy.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

LES FLEURS ANIMEES: Impromptu pour le Piano. Par A. SCHLOESSER.—WHY DON'T HE TELL ME SO? Ballad. By EMILE BERGER.—SWEET KATIE: Irish Ballad. Written by G. HODDER: composed by J. G. CALLCOTT.—"YOU CHIDE ME FOR LOVING": Song. By EMILE BERGER. Boosey and Sons.

The term "impromptu," though in common use among composers, is absurd as they apply it. How can a regular, symmetrical piece of music, evidently the result of thought and premeditation, not only carefully written down, but actually printed and published, be called an impromptu? If the word, so used, has any meaning, the meaning is a false one. Herr Schloesser's "Fleurs Animées" is no more impromptu, but something better. It is a masterly and elegant little piece, the design really very short, is made to go over more than ninght pages, merely by over-sparse printing.

M. Emile Berger's two songs are of a superior order. "Why Don't He Tell Me So?" is a pretty ballad, very arch and lively, and quite English in the style of the melody. Our only critical remark regards merely a matter of taste. We object to the accompaniment looking better from D natural to E sharp. The latter note should be F natural, which, though the same in sound with the other, appears more readily taken by the singer, as it forms the easy interval of the minor third. "You Chide Me for Loving" is simple, elegant, and tender.

Mr. Callcott's "Sweet Katie" is an imitation Irish ballad, a kind of article very easy to manufacture, and of no value when manufactured. That is the use of committing the spurious Scotch and Irish ballads when we have so many real ones, gems of feeling, which at present are too much neglected by the public?

VOCAL COMPOSITIONS OF SIGNOR ADOLFO FERRARI: Eight Ballads for Voice and Piano; "Two Canzonets for Soprano, Mezzo-soprano, and Contralto; Three Italian Songs. Duncan Davison and Co.

None of our native composers—for Signor Ferrari is a native composer, though the son of one of the most eminent Italian masters of his day—have had to do the art of giving expression to the vocal character, in contradistinction from music written for instrumental performance. And this is not only a great but a rare faculty; for a very large proportion of all the vocal compositions of the day are injured by inattention to the broad line of distinction between the two great styles of music, vocal and instrumental. The melodiousness and the purity, smoothness, and facility of melodies intended to be sung without the due admission of those graces which only properly belong to the played. How many songs do we meet with (especially those of the modern German school) deformed by harsh, unvocal passages, wrongly suggested by the mere instrument, and not by feelings of the composer! Such was not the case with the vocal music of the Italian school in the days of its glory. The great masters of that school deeply studied the voice, its character, and its powers of execution and expression, and the result is that their studies are embodied in those immortal works which ought still to be models for the vocal composer. Ferrari is a votary of the pure Italian school, which has been made by our public, by private and public example—by his admirable treatise on "The Voice and Singing"—(now in general request as a text-book authority), and by his vocal compositions which, from time to time, he gives to the public.

Ferrari's latest productions seem to be also his happiest. His "Eight Ballads" are, without exception, charming. They are purely vocal, and they have this precious quality—that the melody in every instance compels the singer to give the truest and most expressive utterance to every word and syllable of the poetry. Where all are so good we find it difficult to pick out any of them for special notice; we may say, however, that the greatest attention has been on us has been made by "Sweet Days of Youth," with its rich accompaniment; by "Sweet Hope," with its graceful and expressive simplicity; and by "Long Years of Care," with its great tenderness. This last song, by the way, is a remarkable exemplification of construction. The melody begins in one key and ends in another—opening in G minor and closing (in both verses) in B flat; the return to the key of G minor being made by a most delicate and prophecy of departure from rule, however, entirely justified by the effect.

The two canzonets for two and three voices are both very charmingly light and delicate. They are for female voices; and, gracefully warbled by three sweet-voiced damsels, are truly fairy music. Of the Italian songs we have only room to say—as we have of all present—"Vieni, Vieni," a serenade, with elegant verses, by the accomplished Signor Maggioni; and "Ah, Non Credea Mirarti," that it possesses all the features which have attempted to describe as characterising Ferrari's music.

LISETTE AT HER SPINNING-WHEEL: a Poem without Words, for the Pianoforte. By EDWARD LODER. Op. 7.—LEVITATION: Mazurka. Par F. EDWARD RACHE.—PRIERE DE JEUNE FILLE. By the Same.—"DORMI JESU": The Virgin's Cradle Hymn. The Music by F. BOOTH. Addison and Co.

We are glad to see once more the name of Edward Loder on the title-page of a new publication. Many charming, if not great, works, gained a place in the highest rank of English musicians, has long been disabled by sickness from pursuing his professional labours; but we hope that this new production is an indication of better health and energy. "Lisette at her Spinning-wheel" is a simple tale of a poor girl who plies her wheel under the kind protection of her mother, while her heart is broken by the loss of her lover. The tale is told in a ballad prelude to the song, and the music is a "sound-picture," full of truth and pathos. Played with congenial feeling, the little piece cannot be listened to without emotion.

Mr. Rache was a young musician of remarkable promise, whose career has been terminated by his untimely death. The two pieces for the pianoforte which he has published (he was an excellent pianoforte performer) will do honour to his memory. "L'Invitation" is a slight and brilliant mazurka, and the "Prière de Jeune Fille" is a simple and beautiful religious strain, with a rich accompaniment in the style of the organ.

The name of Mr. Booth is new to us, but he is evidently a composer of merit. "The Virgin's Cradle Hymn" is Coleridge's translation of the fine old Moravian Hymn.

Dormi, Jesu! Mater ridet,
Qui tam dulcem somnum videt."

The translation is in the same measure as the original, and Mr. Booth's music is adapted to both. It is full of simplicity and feeling, with a considerable share of originality.

PIECES FOR THE PIANOFORTE, by ANGELO CONIO, viz.:—La Reve de Marie, Idylle; Fiorella, Pensée; Contemplation; Fingerfile; Trop tard, largheito sentimentale; Le Repos de Cupid, andante; Mon Paradis, andante grasioso. Chappell and Co.

Till the appearance of these pieces we were acquainted with the compositions of Signor Conio; but he must be a voluminous writer, for the above pieces are numbered from 82 to 87 inclusive, as the last of his works. The author belongs to the most modern school of the pianoforte, and is evidently a thorough master of the instrument, as well as a composer of considerable originality. The names given to these pieces have little meaning that we can discover, and seem to be merely arbitrary names for the pieces to which they them. They are all in the most florid and brilliant style of the day, but the themes are uniformly graceful, and the tours de force and flights of rapid execution are mingled with many beautiful melodies and masterly harmonies and modulations. They are admirable studies, and can be recommended both to every one who aspires to conquer the difficulties of the pianoforte.

SOUVENIR DE LUTZOW, pour le Piano. Par W. KUHE.—GRAND GALLOP DE CONCERT. By W. KUHE.—COME WHERE MY LOVE LIES DREAMING, arranged for the Pianoforte by BERNARD RICHARDS.—OLD FOLKS AT HOME, arranged by the Same.—TOLL THE BELL, arranged by the Same. Chappell and Co.

Herr Kuhe, it is hardly necessary to say, is a well-known and esteemed composer and pianist, whose pieces for the instrument which he professes are in much request among our amateurs. The above are his latest productions, and will not derogate from his reputation. The "Souvenir de Lutzow" consists of several of the favourite airs sung at concerts by that fashionable singer, formed by the help of introductory and connecting passages into a very agreeable pianoforte piece. The "Grand Galop de Concert" is a dashing composition, with the rapid, impetuous movement indicated by its title. It is, moreover, an admirable exercise, especially in playing octaves, which are much used throughout the piece.

Mr. Bernard Richards' arrangements for the piano of popular English songs have been very favourably received by the public, and those named above form an agreeable addition to the number.

POLKA MAZURKA; pour le PIANO. Par A. RUBINSTEIN. Ewer and Co.

Rubinstein is the pianist par excellence—the lion of the day. His style is peculiarly his own, and during his sojourn in London he astonished the public by his marvellous feats on his instrument. Such being the case, it was with pleasure that we found this polka manuscript (as modernised by Mr. Ewer) by a master of the pianoforte, indeed, fine and finished playing, but we have numberless lady amateurs who can execute such pieces as this; and Rubinstein will find their reward, for it is a beautiful and highly original composition.

DROOP NOT, YOUNG LOVER. Song by G. F. HANDEL. Edited and adapted to English Words by WILLIAM HILLS.—WREDS OF THE NIGHT: a Sonnet of Jersey. Music by F. M. JANSEN. Cooke and Co.

Mr. William Hills has gained golden opinions for his elegant and poetical versions of Handel's Italian songs. His edition of Beethoven's songs, which we noticed fully at the time of its publication, has become a text-book for our most accomplished performers when they sing those pieces in public. The song above named is from one of Handel's Italian operas; it is beautiful, and, with the characteristic poetry which Mr. Hills has so felicitously joined to it, it will prove a boon to our English singers. The pianoforte accompaniment, by modern hands, is added by Mr. Hills in a perfectly pure and musicianlike. "Weeds of the Ocean" is a ballad which, if its words are lawful, though not lovely, is set to a very practised writer, for the measure hats occasionally, and there are such rhymes as "storm" and "calm." The melody is simple in its performance; but it is sweet, and relieved by a brilliant accompaniment.

TWO SONGS: "Night Hymn at Sea" and "Oh! ye Voices gone." Composed by JANE FRANK. Oliver.

These songs are the work of a young lady amateur. They are dedicated to her eminent instructress, Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew, by whose lessons, as well as to the composer's own talents, they do much credit. They evince taste and refinement, considerable practical technical knowledge, and their merit is sufficient to encourage the composer to proceed.

WHY DO I LOVE THEE? Ballad. Written and Composed by HERMANN SLATER.—WATERFALL POLKA. Composed by RICARDO SIERVOLD. C. Sailer.

These songs are the work of a pupil in Slater's song. The melody is sweet and flowing, and the accompaniment is musicianlike and effective. But the accent and emphasis of the words are sadly disregarded—a thing the more remarkable in the English compositions of a native. He is, we presume, a foreigner, and this may serve as an excuse for what would be a serious fault in a composition of native growth. Mr. Sirvold's "Waterfall Polka" is very spirited and pretty. It has, in short, all the rhythm and movement that is not only well adapted for dancing, but, independent of dancing, is an agreeable little pianoforte piece.

THE FARM.

THE stock sales of the season open at Stockwood Park, near Luton, next Thursday, when Mr. Strafford brings to the hammer the whole of Mr. John Day's herd of Shorthorns, the property of the late Duke of Bedford; and Kirkwington and Nobleman, of Mr. Bates's blood; British Sovereign, Duke of Oxford, Palmerston Guest, Prince Oscar, and First Fruits, of Mr. Booth's; and Jasper and Duke of Cleveland, who has been the principal crosses. On that and the following day Mr. Bloomfield's herd, of one hundred Herefords, descended from the Hower, Jeffries and Knight blood, will be sold at Corve Dale, near Church Stretton, in Shropshire, by Messrs. Stock and Wigan. Mr. Strafford also announces important shorthorn sales in Warwickshire, Leicestershire, Devonshire, and Notts during the next six weeks, so the season promises to be busy. There are also several sales of stock in the market. Mr. Sandby offers his Duke of Argyll; Mr. Unthank, of Nobleman and Inverness; Mr. Thompson, of Grand Duke and Duke; the latter a very elegant animal of the Colonel Cradock and Lax blood, with the same fashionable cross, or, perhaps, ever sav on a bull; and Captain Spencer his yearling Seigneur, by Lord of the Valley, and half brother to Mr. Rambler's celebrated Prince Palatine.

The forty-fourth number of the Royal Agricultural Society's Journal has been published on hand. Notwithstanding a considerable or an increase of seventy-nine names since the last half yearly meeting; and its funded property amounts to £10,000 in the New Three per Cents, the Society is not overburdened by its liabilities, which are chiefly those at Chester the year before, the falling off is about £725, but the receipts are also proportionately reduced.

Among the most interesting papers in the journal may be mentioned that by Mr. Spooner, following Professor Spooner. Speaking of Mr. Valentine Barford's flock, he observes that it is difficult to breed entirely from his own flock, with no ill effects whatever, except that he ought to exercise more judgment in the selection of the portraits of the colossal-headed old Wiltshire sheep, which sometimes appear in his flock. Mr. Barford's sheep in the Dorset horned sheep as much superior to the old Wiltshire and Hampshire, but adds, if the Dorsetshire flocks have of late years been crossed and improved by the Hampshire, the Hampshire flocks of Lord Ashburton are now rare, and the distinction of the two breeds by the colour of the nose more difficult to ascertain. The report on the best farm implements speaks with justice of the deep perplexity entailed upon judges by the miscellaneous department of the Implement-yard, where they are called upon to decide on every conceivable article, from an apple-parer and a beefsteak-beater to a baby's perambulator and a lady sailing dress. The report needs a radical reform in this department, and we trust that in future the exhibitors will be prepared to specify the merits and style of the articles they bring. It is wholly alien to the original purpose to allow them to turn the ground into a mere bazaar. The Use of Salt to Land, by Mr. Grant, Experiments on Soils, by Dr. Voelcker; Experiments with Manures on Permanent Meadow Land; Pulping Roots for Sheep, by Mr. Torr; Sir John Kaye's Model Homesteads; Maxims are among the other principal papers. The latter is interesting, but we question the wisdom of a similar plan. In reference to the gold medal Hereford ox of last Christmas, Mr. Morton states that his weight when slaughtered was 87st. 6lb. (lbs.); which, considering that he was twenty-seven months old and seven months, is marvellous.

The great prize in the present number is Mr. Robert Smith's report on the live stock at Warwick, which is quite as keenly looked for by exhibitors as Mr. Rham's annual May comments by artists and the hanging committees of the Royal Academy. The show of cattle at Hereford should be it, we think, the best bit in the paper, and he tells us of those herd gleaned of old days, one of which stood 7 feet high and girthed 12 feet. This was at the very first meeting of the Smithfield Club, in 1799, and a cow bred by the same Mr. Tully in the last year that the different breeds were shown in competition, the Hereford steers and oxen won 185 prizes, or only five less than all the other breeds put together! Bulls, the first prize cow in milk, appears to have been his favourite in this class; and among the Devons, "those genius of the ox tribe," as he terms them, he includes Mr. James Quartly's two-year-old heifer Gem, whose parents, Napoleon and Graceful, were both winners at the West of England Society in 1855, while the latter was first again at Salisbury Royal. With the shorthorn bulls and bull calves, save Royal Rutherly, Prince Talwyntyd, and Royal Turk, he does not seem to have been especially struck. The shearling Leicester rams he did not consider, as a class, so good as usual; and he seems to coincide with the general belief that Mr. Sanday's aged ram—placed third out of forty-seven—was the best in its class.

Of the aged Southdown rams he does not profess to think very highly, and suggests that many of the defeated specimens "want another rib or two to hold them up;" and so on through the remainder of the sheep, horses, and pigs, blaming here and praising there in a quiet, judicious way; though, to a general reader, the paper would be pleasanter if none but the especially crack animals were introduced, and the comments on the rest of the classes made more general. At present the report is perhaps too much of an invoice-list and too little of an essay.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

SCULL v. INGRAM.

Mr. Edwin James, Q.C., Mr. Hilbery, and Mr. Gordon Allen were counsel for the plaintiff; Mr. Bovill, Q.C., Mr. Huddleston, Q.C., and Mr. Prentice were counsel for the defendant.

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff, by one John Sadleir, his confidential agent, had purchased an estate near Castle Ryde, through the Encumbered Estates Court in Ireland, which was taken in the name of Ryre, that the plaintiff afterwards instructed by John Sadleir the resale of the estate at a profit, that the said John Sadleir represented to the plaintiff that he had resold the estate at a profit to the defendant, and that the defendant afterwards fraudulently and deceitfully, and in order to induce the plaintiff to believe that the said John Sadleir conveyed to him by John Sadleir was true, and to act upon the same, and thereby to enable Sadleir to take advantage of it, stated to the plaintiff that he had bought the estate through John Sadleir, and that he was the owner thereof, and that the said information of John Sadleir was true. The declaration went on to state that by such representation John Sadleir was enabled to deal with the property as his own and to mortgage it. The plaintiff had thereby been deprived of obtaining the estate and of the increased profits the estate might have produced. The defendant pleaded first not guilty, and there were six other pleas traversing the various allegations contained in the declaration.

Mr. Edwin James, in stating the case to the jury, said that the plaintiff, Mr. Scully, was a Queen's counsel, member of the Irish Bar, and representative in Parliament for the county Tipperary. The defendant was a gentleman of considerable enterprise, the proprietor of a newspaper which they all knew. He was also M.P. for Sligo, and had been for the last eight months. The representing to the plaintiff that he had bought, and was the owner of, the estate called Castle Ryde was true. But the information was not the only or well known, and no doubt acted in this matter from motives which it was difficult perhaps to divine. The plaintiff purchased the said estate through the estate under circumstances which would be detailed to them in evidence. The purchase was made in the name of Ryre, a relative of those whose memories had become, he (Mr. James) might almost say, infamous. He was at one time the confidential agent and secretary of the Irish Board. He was a person of very considerable activity and quickness, and of very great ability. He rose from a low position until he had settled down in Dublin as a practising attorney, enjoying the confidence of persons of property, of respectability, and of wealth. He was also a Parliament. He then acquired a vast influence over many of the representatives of the Irish people, and that influence became one of the Lords of the Treasury in Lord Aberdeen's Government. Mr. Sadleir, at the time he first became connected with the Irish Board, and the plaintiff placed unbounded confidence in him; but with what result they would hear in a short, yet, he feared, a most melancholy and forbear bunkafter the plaintiff). During 1853 and 1854, when the proceedings complained of took place, Mr. Sadleir was in the zenith of his power and position. He possessed a will, reckless, and overreaching ambition. He had the power of fascination, and he preserved a straightforward and honest course, amidst of the devious and tortuous path which he followed, it must have been observed, and was very early in contact with. He, however, became involved—and every phase of his life showed it—irretrievably involved in pecuniary difficulties. He had become the chairman of the London and County Bank, and had acquired considerable confidence in his name, as no doubt was natural. But he had become involved, entangled, and enmeshed in difficulties which his ambition had brought down him, and which he could not extricate himself; and it was a remarkable fact that this day four years, under the dim twilight of the morning, the body of John Sadleir was discovered on Hampstead Heath. He had committed suicide. That would be found material in the investigation. The plaintiff purchased the estate in question in the Encumbered Estates Court for the original purchase of the estate for £19,000, its reputed sale by John Sadleir for £21,000 to the defendant, and the subsequent sale by the latter passed between them, and referred to the continued rise in the price till Sadleir purchased it for £19,000 by Ryre.

The Lord Chief Justice interposed and said: I don't think, Mr. James, you hardly go to the jury the case that the defendant bought the estate by Sadleir's fraud upon the plaintiff. I don't think you put it so high as that. You may put it in the alternative, but you let it be clearly laid out to the last issues involved. I cannot but think that between two gentlemen with no imputation on the character of either, and residing in such extent in public, the matter might be settled in a different form to the present. I cannot but think that the matter might be laid more distinctly before the defendant or any other person in his position to avoid a public inquiry and discussion. I wish to express myself in that sense.

Mr. E. James: I thoroughly appreciate the kind manner that have been addressed to me, and I shall endeavour to follow you here. The case in which I have felt the deepest anxiety from feeling that Mr. Scully's honour is pledged and involved in it, and I am sure that the honourable gentleman which your Lordship has interposed is very opportune, and I am sure your Lordship will not think that I am wanting in that manner.

The Lord Chief Justice: Yes, and I am anxious to see whether a matter like this cannot be settled in a manner to avoid the publicity of future hostility.

Mr. E. James: I never felt more deeply or greater anxiety than in this case. They are gentlemen of the same club, meeting in the lobby of the House of Commons, and I am conscious of doing my duty fearlessly with the honour of my client.

The Lord Chief Justice: If personal honour is involved, let it be tried out by all means; but, if it is a pecuniary matter, I would submit that it might be settled in a manner less public.

Mr. Bovill: Mr. Ingram feels that his honour is involved in this case. He is the gentleman who purchased the estate, and he feels his position rather compromised by the verdict in the first trial having passed against him, owing to his not having produced documents which he now has in his power. He is anxious that the whole matter should be investigated. The matter has been investigated before Lord Cornwallis, and he has come to this Court there for further investigation. Mr. Ingram feels that in consequence of that verdict he ought to submit to a fresh investigation of the case.

The Lord Chief Justice: Sadleir having held out to Mr. Ingram that he was the owner of the estate, and that he was not, he was placed very considerable with the plaintiff having been deceived by Sadleir. If a gentleman of such great influence as Sadleir was in the habit of using the habits as the plaintiff had been deceived by Sadleir, it is very hard if such a thing is not considered. I am very anxious that the case, containing anything a fraudulent motive to the defendant, and therefore it is that I am anxious. If you will not accept my advice, I have nothing more to say to you.

Mr. Bovill: If the charge of fraud is withdrawn I have no objection to the course your Lordship suggests. Mr. Ingram would, however, prefer an investigation in a public court of justice.

The Lord Chief Justice: Sadleir having held out to Mr. Ingram that he was the owner of the estate, and that he was not, he was placed very considerable with the plaintiff having been deceived by Sadleir. If a gentleman of such great influence as Sadleir was in the habit of using the habits as the plaintiff had been deceived by Sadleir, it is very hard if such a thing is not considered. I am very anxious that the case, containing anything a fraudulent motive to the defendant, and therefore it is that I am anxious. If you will not accept my advice, I have nothing more to say to you.

Mr. Bovill: If the charge of fraud is withdrawn I have no objection to the course your Lordship suggests. Mr. Ingram would, however, prefer an investigation in a public court of justice.

The learned counsel and the solicitors then retired from the court. On their return

The Lord Chief Justice said: I have considered what in my judgment ought to be done in this case. The transaction has been stated—viz., that personal honour is not involved in this case—I think it would be advisable that the matter should be settled out of court, and submit to arbitrators footing that will be employed in fighting out the case in a public way. I do not see any difficulty in the matter, and I trust that the plaintiff and defendant should involve any question of honour or character between them in the present case. One or two of the same gentlemen may have been misled by the unfortunate man who took his own life, and who was guilty of the most extraordinary frauds ever conceived by him; and there is nothing more simple than to suppose that the plaintiff may even now be misled by the same position as he supposes that the defendant was misled by the same position. I cannot see, if he has been misled by the machinations of Sadleir, why the pecuniary part of his case cannot be settled other than before a jury, and probably more satisfactorily. The course, therefore, which your Lordship suggests would be that all imputations of a personal character, of dishonour or misconduct, should be withdrawn on both sides, and the matter referred to some gentleman at the bar to settle.

Mr. Bovill: Mr. Ingram's object has been to take every opportunity to meet the charges and attacks that have been made against his character. After the statements which your Lordship has made, that all imputations shall be withdrawn on both sides, I have no hesitation in agreeing to your Lordship's suggestion.

The Lord Chief Justice: I am very glad to hear it, for I think it will result satisfactorily to all parties.

The jury were then discharged.

"ST. BERNARDINO, AND OTHER SAINTS."—IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

"LANDSCAPE, WITH WATER."—BY RUYSDAEL.—IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

NEW PICTURES IN THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

We have already written in some detail concerning some of the new purchases made for the national collection, but the additions, we are happy to say, are so frequent that it requires some watchfulness to keep up with them. They are of various classes also, which is right, for the scope of Art is as boundless as Nature itself, and is not developed in any one or more particular schools. Italian and Dutch art, widely dissimilar in their purpose and modes of treatment, are both invested with all the attributes of original schools; both exhibit the original thought and creative will of the master, and present themselves to the educated mind as models for intellectual study. Of each of these schools we give examples in the present sheet.

Our first Illustration is after the grand picture by Alessandro Bonvicino, called Il Moretto, representing St. Bernardino and other saints, which was purchased last year from the collection of the late Lord Northwick. It is to be remarked of the Venetian school that it retained the severity and simple religious fervour of the early church-painting long after the dramatic power of Raphael and Michael Angelo; and the grace of Correggio had given a new and attractive turn to the pencil of the painter in other parts of Italy. Of this solemnity and earnestness of purpose the works of Alessandro Bonvicino afford a striking example; and it is upon this ground, as well as upon the intrinsic excellence of the performance, that we congratulate the country upon the acquisition so recently made of one of his works. This artist was born at Brescia in 1500, and died in 1547. Whilst in his colouring he adhered to Titian's first manner, he attempted in his design and composition to infuse into the inherent stateliness of the Venetian a little of the grandeur of form and character which distinguished that of Rome.

This picture presents us with a noble group of saints, in which St. Bernardino of Siena is the principal figure. At his feet are three mitres, being those of Ferrara, Siena, and Urbino, denoting three bishoprics which he successively declined. His countenance is stamped in a remarkable manner with that spirit of self-denial which prevailed above all other considerations in the earlier ages of Christianity, when the words, "He that would be great among you, let him be least," was a living principle with the fathers of the Church. He looks at the spectator with an air of calm and inflexible gravity, and holds aloft in his right hand the luminous monogram of Christ. In his left hand is the sacred volume, with the words inscribed in Latin, "Father, I have manifested thy name unto man." Around him are four other saints of reverential mien. The figure of St. Francis kneeling, habited in monkish garb, his hands marked with the stigmata, is grandly conceived. Kneeling opposite to him is St. Joseph, from whose staff sprouts a little white flower, the emblem of purity. Behind Joseph stands St. Jerome, reading a book, and at his feet is the attendant lion, from whose foot he once extracted a thorn, and who follows him in grateful submission. Behind St. Francis, on the right, is St. Nicholas of Bari, who has the costume and crosier of a bishop, and holds in his hand three balls as symbolically characteristic of him. Above this group, and enthroned amid clouds, with a halo of glory, in the rear, is represented the marriage of St. Catharine with the infant Christ, which was a favourite subject of the early church-painters. St. Catharine, whose mien is extremely modest, carries in her hand her crown of martyrdom. On the opposite side is St. Clara, who kneels in adoration. The colouring of this picture is solid and sober in tone; somewhat heavy, perhaps, it might be called, particularly in the lower part; but this was not inappropriate to the solemnity and gravity which in those days were associated with the character of the apostolic mission. In the upper portion the artist exhibits a breadth of light and brilliancy of colour intended, probably, to illustrate the condition of the saints in heaven as contrasted with those who have not yet completed their earthly mission.

Jacob Ruysdael, the founder of the Dutch school of poetic or ideal landscape, as Claude was of that of the Italian, was a master of too high importance and too potent influence to be suffered to remain long absent from our National Collection. We are not surprised, therefore, that Sir Charles Eastlake should have watched eagerly for the appearance in the market of what he considered worthy specimens of him, and that he should have shown himself not grudging of the public money to procure them when they presented themselves. Accordingly, at the recent sale of the collection of Count Stolberg at Hanover, the worthy President lighted upon two Ruysdaels, which he purchased for the nation at a cost, as we understand, of somewhat over two thousand pounds. Both these pictures represent waterfalls so similar in character that they might be considered to have been taken on the same spot, only differing in the points of sight. This we consider unfortunate, for, although some of Ruysdael's grandest efforts were employed in depicting the savage mountain torrent rushing between some yawning chasm, tearing and whirling amid rocks, and filling the surrounding wide solitudes with its din, yet he was even more persuasively suggestive in the calmer retreats of wooded landscape watered by some murmuring brook, or the still quieter, almost stagnant pool, with perhaps, a ruined tower or dismantled mansion crumbling in the neglected shade to point to what was once the busy haunt of man. Occasionally we meet him in green meadows and merry cornfields, with cheerful sunrays fitfully gladdening the scene; but these were the exceptions, and his mood was habitually melancholy, dwelling on the past rather than the present or the future. Rightly to appreciate this great master, therefore, and what he did himself and what he did for Hobbema, who followed him in a sunnier vein, we should have had specimens of him in more varied character than in the two works before us, one of which we would gladly exchange for any of a few which have come to the hammer in this country within this year or two. Indeed, in writing about these new acquisitions, it would be useless to conceal the fact that an impression has got about—with what reason we will not take upon ourselves positively to assert—that one of these waterfall pictures (not the one we engrave) is of more than questionable authenticity; indeed, a copy; and the name of Jan van Kessell, who lived during the latter half of the seventeenth century, and who is known to have painted a great deal in imitation of Ruysdael's style, is mentioned as the maker of it. Those who assert this point to the two works as they hang side by side, and insist that they contain internal evidence—in the water, in the sky—in support of their position; in proof, at least, that both could not have been painted by the same hand. For a waterfall subject this is probably as fine a specimen as could be procured of the master, exhibiting all his grander and severer qualities in their fulness of power. Nothing can surpass the effect of the headlong impetuous torrent as it breaks into foam against the rock, strewing the edge of the current with broken timber, the victims of its vengeance. The sky, too, is hard and cold; and the solitary homestead on the slightly-elevated ground in the rear but heightens the dreary aspect of the situation. Upon the frail bridge are some herdsmen driving sheep and cattle, just to show that life still struggles on amidst the cold, inhospitable scene.

We believe that both these pictures were engraved by Catharine Prestel, an engraver of eminence who lived during the latter part of the last century.

"COME ALONG." BY JENKINS.

The committee of the Art-Union of London have selected for their presentation plate this year a very original and telling picture by J. J. Jenkins, entitled "Come Along!" The scene is a fordable pass in a mountain stream, surrounded by a most picturesque view. A young woman, with a load on her back, is picking her way on the foot-stones across the stream, and is calling back to her young daughter to "come along," who does so, as well as she can, picking her steps cautiously. This is of a class of subjects which everybody understands, and pleases everybody; and the Art-Union, having so many thousands of subscribers in all classes of life to gratify, does right in selecting them. The picture has been engraved in the first style of art by F. Holl.

The Cuban Ladies in Church.—The second thing to be done in Matanzas, if you arrive on Saturday, is to attend military mass at the Cathedral on Sunday morning. This commences at eight o'clock; but the hour previous may be advantageously employed in watching the arrival and arrangement of the female aristocracy of Matanzas. These enter in groups of twos and threes, carrying their prayer-books, and followed by slaves of either sex, who bear the prayer-carpet of their mistresses. The ladies are wonderfully got up, considering the early hour; and their toilets suggest that they may not have undressed since the ball of the night before. All that hoops, powder, and puffery can do for them has been done; they walk in silk attire, and their hair is what is technically termed dressed. Some of them bring their children, bedizened like dolls, and mimicking mamma's gestures and genuflexion in a manner more provoking to sadness than to satire. If the dressing is elaborate, the crossing is also. It does not consist of one simple cross, In nomine Patris, &c.; they seem to make three or four crosses from forehead to chin, and conclude by kissing the thumb-nail, in honour of what we could not imagine. Entering the middle aisle, which is divided from the rest by a row of seats on either side, they choose their position, and motion to the dark attendant to spread the carpet. Some of them evince considerable strategic skill in the selection of their ground. All being now in readiness, they drop on their knees, spread their flounces, cross themselves, open their books, and look about them. Their attendants retire a little, spread a handkerchief on the ground, and modestly kneel behind them, obviously expecting to be saved with the family. These are neatly, sometimes handsomely, dressed. In this status things remain until the music of the regiment is heard. With a martial sound of trumpets it enters the church, and fills the aisles, the officers taking place within the chancel, and a guard of honour of eight soldiers ranging on either side of the officiating priest. And now our devotions begin in good earnest; for, simultaneously with the regiment, the jeunesse dorée of Matanzas has made its appearance, and has spread itself along the two long lines of demarcation which separate the fair penitents from the rest of the congregation. The ladies now spread their flounces again, and their eyes find other occupation than the dreary Latin of their missals. There is, so to speak, a lively and refreshing time between the youths of both sexes, while the band plays its utmost, and "Evangel," "Kyrie," and "Credo," are recited to the music of "Trovatore" and "Traviata." That child of four years old, dressed in white and gold flounces, and white satin boots with heels, handles her veil and uses her eyes like mamma, eager for notice, and delighted with the gay music and uniforms. The moment comes to elevate the Host: thump goes the drum, the guard presents arms, and the soldiers, instead of kneeling, bend forward in a most uncomfortable manner. Another thump, and all that is over; the swords are returned to their sheaths, and soon, the loud music coming to an end, the regiment marches out of church, very much as it marched in, its devotional experiences being known to Heaven alone. Ladies and lovers look their last, the flounces rise in pyramids, the prayer-carpets are rolled up, and, with a silken sweep and rush youth, beauty, and fashion forsake the church, where piety has hardly been, and go home to breakfast.—A Trip to Cuba.

The Perseverance of Milan states that General Manabrea, having visited the new fortifications of Bologna, has announced that, with the labour of six hundred men now engaged upon them, the town will, in the course of fifty days more, become a fortress of considerable importance, and may, by further additions, become a fortress of the first order.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

C. F. H., Exeter.—The problem in three moves is defective, for if Black play 1. P to K B's 4th and then 2. R to Q R's 4th, mate is impracticable. That in six moves, however, is a very clever position, though it requires more examination than we have yet been enabled to give it.

Engreb.—It is customary in chess matches for each player to use the same coloured men with which he began to the end of the contest. See the revised chess code in "Chess Praxis."

M. D. P.—As we have before explained, if White play 1. Kt to K Kt 3rd, Black answers with 1. P to B 8th, making a Kt, and prevents the mate.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH, OLDHAM ROAD, MANCHESTER.

THE erection of this church has, it is thought, solved a practical difficulty of the day—viz., how is it possible to build large and yet cheap churches for the many poor and populous districts that abound in our cities and manufacturing towns? A good stone church would cost at least £5 or £6 per sitting, and the total expense of one for one thousand persons and upwards is such as to terrify any friends of the poor who would desire to collect funds for such a purpose. Iron churches certainly cost less, being about £3 per sitting, but these the Bishops will not consecrate as parish or district churches, so that they are only erected temporarily. Brick structures have also been resorted to, but generally, in order to avoid expense, they have been made more like ecclesiastical barns than churches. In the case, however, of St. Peter's, Oldham road, Manchester, we think the architects (Messrs. Isaac Holden and Son, of that city) have proved the possibility of combining cheapness with a pure ecclesiastical style, and of erecting, at a comparatively small cost, a handsome church for a poor neighbourhood.

The district of St. Peter's, which will be one of the rectories formed by the Manchester Division Act of 1850, contains a population of between 14,000 and 15,000souls, nearly all of the labouring classes. The need of a church was urgent, but the money for the purpose had to be solicited from individuals wholly unconnected with the place, except by sympathy. Then, the difficulty of obtaining land suitable for a site in a place so crowded and built over was no small one. However, the few gentlemen interested in the matter resolutely persevered: the site was purchased, and the excavations of the church commenced in the middle of May last year.

The church is Lombardic in its style, having nave and side aisles, with a semicircular apse at the east end, and a lofty campanile or tower at the north-west angle. The interior, which will comfortably seat 1350 persons, is divided by two rows of very ornamental cast-iron columns, supporting the clerestory arches, which are formed (as also are all the other arches, chancel piers and jambs, &c.) of white bricks. The roof of the nave is elaborately panelled, and is divided into bays by ornamental semicircular wood ribs or principals. A gallery extends along the side aisles and across the west end. In the latter it is intended to place the organ, over which there is a large wheel window. The general appearance of the interior, which is very finely proportioned, gains considerable attraction from the bench-ends, the whole of which are formed of cast-iron of a most elaborate and beautiful design by the architects of the building. The tower is intended to contain a peal of eight bells, a subscription for which has been commenced. The tenor bell is now being cast by Messrs. Mears and Co. The total cost of the church, inclusive of everything connected with the building and superintendence, the furnishing, the heating, lighting, and bells, is about £4200, or about three guineas per sitting. St. Peter's Church was consecrated by the Lord Bishop of the diocese on Saturday, the 14th of January, as reported at the time in this Journal. The Incumbent is the Rev. F. Whylock Davis, who has officiated in the district for three years.

ST. PETER'S CHURCH, OLDHAM ROAD, MANCHESTER.

THE WESTMINSTER PALACE HOTEL.

THIS monster hotel is in course of being erected at the east end of Victoria-street, by a company of noblemen and gentlemen, for affording hotel accommodation to members of Parliament and to gentlemen frequenting the law courts, as well as to foreigners and the public at large. To make this hotel as perfect as possible the architects, Messrs. W. and A. Moseley, were directed to inspect various Continental hotels, and their investigations extended to upwards of thirty of the principal ones. Having completed their designs, all the principal builders were invited to compete, and the election fell upon Mr. Myers, his estimate being the lowest. He has vigorously applied himself to the prosecution of the work, and promises to complete it within the specified time—viz., the 31st of December next. As an exterior view affords but little information regarding the internal arrangements, it may be stated in further elucidation of the structure that the large windows on the right of the great doorway belong to the coffee-room, which is 96 feet in length, 50 feet in width, and 18 feet in height, whilst it will be seen that those on the opposite side of the doorway have two windows of the same height as those just alluded to. The lower tier of these windows belongs to a story of committee and arbitration rooms; and the reason why there are two stories on this side, in contradistinction to one on the other, is that in this part of the building are the smaller rooms, and on the ground floor of the part on the other side of the doorway are the larger rooms. Besides the great coffee-room, there are two others—one at the extreme end of the building, the other fronting Tothill-street, 100 feet in length, intended for public dinners and meetings.

The hotel possesses more than four hundred rooms, all having immediate external light and air. The upper floors will be reached by an ascending-room, moved by hydraulic pressure, with the most complete arrangement to prevent accidents; and the internal finishings of all the principal parts will be on a scale of magnificence more generally to be found in palaces rather than in hotels. The building is to be fireproof. Its area exceeds throughout 3000 square yards on the ground plan, and which, counting its eight stories, gives more than five acres of flooring in the establishment.

The site is not without interesting associations. On it stood the house and printing-press of old Caxton; and the board of directors, taking advantage of this circumstance, have opened a subscription for putting up a statue of him on the exact spot, and a model of this, by Duncan, may be seen in the model-room at the Royal Academy. On the side also stood the old Bede-house of Westminster Abbey.

MINISTERIAL SUCCESS.

THERE can be, of course, but one opinion with regard to the result of the majority in the House of Commons in favour of the principle of the financial scheme of the Government. There was in the composition of that majority, too, a feature which in itself deserves to be honoured by the name of novelty, for, examining the division lists, it becomes clear that a considerable number of the votes recorded must have been won by conviction. To be sure that conviction may, in many instances, have been the conviction that if certain members did not vote in a certain way there was not a doubt but that their constituencies would inquire in the most unmistakably unpleasant manner the reason why, at the very earliest opportunity. Few of those who were in this case were allowed the negative privilege of absenting themselves from the division, and presenting the rather undignified spectacle which was exhibited by Lord Derby's Solicitor-General, who perforce ran away at the last moment, leaving his leader in the very throes of defeat. But it is only charitable to suppose that some of the opinions recorded were born of abstract belief in the value and the rectitude of the proposals of Mr. Gladstone. It was satisfactory to find that the opinion of the country was, in the main, faithfully reflected in a House of Commons which was elected under the immediate auspices and influences, pure or corrupt, of a so-called Conservative Government. Any attempt, which was indicated rather than declared, to revive obsolete principles, and to raise the broken voice of Protection, was more than defeated—it was crushed out. The endeavour to check a principle of finance which is essentially progressive, and carrying countless benefits with its progress, which sows in the present those seeds which will in the future expand into prolific national benefits, and substituting for it a reactionary and barren system, was notably foiled. The adroit effort to combine a few special interests and threatened monopolies against the Government plan of liberal finance might have been successful as a party move, and at least impeded, if it did not actually destroy, measures of utility which were only questioned by a kind of Parliamentary special pleading, but for the fact that the voice of the country was heard menacingly in the Chamber of our Representatives. The demand to affirm once more the great principles of free trade and commercial progress was, if not loud in the sense of being noisy, too effectually and decidedly expressed to be resisted; and all that is now left to the Ministry is the careful and conciliatory guidance of the details of their measures.

It would be a grievous error if the importance and even the difficulty of this part of their task were to be understated. There might at this moment, without disadvantage, occur to the mind of Lord Palmerston certain reminiscences of 1857-8 which ought to play, in this his moment of triumph, the warning part of the death's head in the midst of the feast. He learned then, and it is to be hoped that he has not forgotten the lesson, that success has its difficulties and its dangers as well as misfortune, and that many a victor of to-day has been, by his own act, the vanquished of to-morrow. It might have been hoped by some, but we doubt if it was expected by many, that a broad and general attack upon the Budget would have been successful. It was probably a mistake in tactics for the Opposition to adopt that course; but it ought not to be supposed that the repulse which has ensued has resulted in the utter disorganisation of the attacking force. They are, notwithstanding many defections, still numerous, resolute, and, on the whole, well led, especially if a more desultory and skirmishing kind of warfare is adopted. It is possible that many of those members who, Conservative by profession, have been forced, by a wholesome dread of their constituents, to swallow the principles of the Budget may revenge themselves by turning against details. Already there are evidences that opportunities enough will be afforded of assault on parts of the Budget which may once more unite and close the ranks of the Opposition, and which will not be resisted with perfect unanimity by the supporters of the Government. May it be allowed to us to hint that Mr. Gladstone, whose splendid combativeness in the van of debate has had the effect not only of leading his followers right through the broken ranks of his opponents, but of snatching adherents from those very ranks, as he passed in his successive rapid, and resistless charges, has already exhibited some of that spirit which is, perhaps, inseparable from his high and impulsive nature? Already we fear that he shows symptoms of undervaluing his enemy. It is easy to imagine how a man whose fortune it has been so often of late to command not merely the applause but the submissive suffrages of a listening Senate, to sweep by his overwhelming eloquence every vestige of opposition from his path, cannot find it easy at once to subside into the calm and tactical manipulator of the House of Commons. There is about him an impatience of criticism and an eagerness to get on which, unless checked and modified, may conclude in generating a spirit of resistance which may be either active and aggressive, or, if that line should fail, dogged and pertinacious. As far as can be judged from what has taken place during the discussions of this week, there is every probability that the Opposition will partake of both these characters. One thing is certain, and there are overt acts enough to prove it, that opposition is, though "scotched," by no means dead. There are notices which go direct to certain important points in the financial scheme which have been prompted probably by intimations on the part of some of the Liberal members who have gone heartily enough in support of the Budget, as it recognises a principle and a policy, of a willingness to consider, if not to vote for, certain modifications and certain alterations which would result in the striking out of the scheme very important features.

For instance, it ought to be known as generally as possible that the proposal for the remission of the duty on paper is directly assailed, and, looking to the form which the intended assault has taken, it is not too much to say that that proposition is in some peril. A notice of amendment has been given by Sir William Miles that, in lieu of the proposed income tax of tenpence in the pound, the rate shall be fixed at ninepence, and that, in order to supply the deficiency caused by the change, the abolition of the paper duty should be postponed. Now, it is self-evident that a proposition to reduce the rate of the income tax bears with it a very ad captandum aspect. It speaks with a certain directness to a great many persons to urge that it would be more advantageous to the general public to have a penny in the pound less income tax to pay, instead of giving a million towards the advancement and improvement of newspapers; for it should be understood that a considerable number of persons unthinkingly believe that the abolition of the paper duty is a newspaper question alone, while, in point of fact, nothing can be further from the truth. It is in a very diminished and, indeed, a minimum degree that newspapers proper are interested in the remission of the duty on paper. The question is a much larger one; the impost is one which presses on a large, and which, but for the impost, would be an increasing, branch of trade and industry, that has opened, and would still further open, great fields for well-remunerated labour, and which, in reference to production, is not special but general, inasmuch as it concerns an article that enters into the daily and hourly use of every class and every individual of the community. It is from this point of view that the remission of this tax should be considered as a vital element of the Budget. It is not merely as with a tax upon knowledge, which gentlemen who are still inclined to speculate on the value of the extension of education and the free progress of opinion may think is a question which may be very reasonably postponed, although that part of the subject is quite capable of being argued out to demonstration, that those who are pledged to support the principles of the Budget through its details ought to deal with the paper duty. It is in its sense as a virtual prohibition of an important branch of industry—in its character as a remarkable obstruction to the freedom of trade—that this impost should be approached; and it is, probably, not too much to say that, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer gives way in this matter, immense encouragement will be given to other species of opposition which will go far to weaken, if not to destroy, the unity of his financial scheme.

We have taken this particular item as a specimen of the series of sectional attacks which are likely to be made on the Budget. Already we have seen that much smaller interests, and matters involving far more personal concerns, can be contested against the Government with vigour and pertinacity. It is true that in these minor matters the Chancellor of the Exchequer has displayed great resolution, and has enforced rather than won majorities sufficiently large for his purposes. It is hoped that when questions of larger import, and more directly interwoven with the great abstract principles on which the financial plan is founded, come to be discussed, and when the opposition assumes a broader and a more serious basis, that the same courage, the same firmness, and the same untiring activity and ability will be shown in their defence. The most earnestly counsel the display of these admirable and essential qualities should be judiciously tempered by forbearance and some slight deference to the peculiar constitution, and even the humours, of the House of Commons. Where this capricious is in the main generous and easily led when those who seek to reach its convictions are not only actually inspired with a lofty sense of its high mission, but by their demeanour and their treatment of that assembly give evidence of that feeling.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

OPENING OF THE LEGISLATIVE CHAMBERS.

The Chambers were opened on Thursday by a speech of the Emperor. The Emperor commenced by saying that the object of the commencement of last Session he had to warn them against exaggerated apprehensions of a probable war, but now to allay similar disquieting causes of the peace itself. This peace has been the object of his sincere desire, and he will neglect nothing to maintain it. He can only congratulate himself on his friendly relations with all the European Powers, the extreme East being the only part of the globe where his armies are engaged. Since the peace to the war in China, his Majesty observes that he hopes the difficulties in Europe are drawing to a close, and that Italy is about to be constituted herself. Without dwelling on the negotiations which have been protracted through so many months, he will proceed to speak of a few principal points. The Emperor continues:—

The predominating thought of the treaty of Villafranca was to obtain the almost complete independence of Italy, from the Alps to the shores of the Archduke. This transaction having failed, notwithstanding my most earnest endeavours, I have had to express my opinion, but to respect, both at Vienna and at Turin, for the situation, by being prolonged, threatened to terminate without issue. With the view of giving mutual explanations between my Government and that of Austria, it led England, Prussia, and Russia to take measures which in their opinion would clear the desire of the great Powers to reconcile all interests. In order to second this desire, it was necessary for France to preserve a plan to a position of which by Europe seemed most probable. Guaranteeing Italy against foreign interference by my arms, I had the right to lay down the limits of that guarantee. Thus I have not hesitated to declare to the King of Sardinia that, while I left him full liberty of action, I could not follow him in a policy which had the disadvantage of appearing in the eyes of Europe to be based on a desire to absorb all the States of Italy, and which threatened to give rise to new conflagrations. I counselled him to respect humanity to the wishes of the populations which had been annexed to him, but to maintain the autonomy of Tuscany, and to respect in principle the rights of the Holy See, although the latter power could not satisfy all the world, it had the advantage of reserving principles and calming apprehensions, and it must be for the interest of Italy to avoid raising new millions of men. In the presence of this transformation of Northern Italy, which gives to a powerful State all the passages of the Alps, it was my duty, for the safety of my frontier, to claim the French side of the mountains, the claim of a territory of which the inhabitants had spoken which ought to alarm Europe, or give a denial to the policy of disinterestedness which I had more than once manifested. My conscience does not wish to proceed to this aggrandisement, however feeble it may be, either by military occupation or by promulgation of a decree of annexation manœuvres, but by expressing the question frankly to the great Powers. They will appreciate the compensation by their equity and disinterestedness. were either of them in similar circumstances, that the important territorial rearrangement which has taken place gives rise to a just compensation indicated by Nature herself.

The Emperor then proceeds to treat of the question of the Romagna, and observes that there is reason to hope for an early solution of that difficulty.

The Government (he then says) is about to submit measures with the object of facilitating production, improving the condition of those who labour, and multiplying the communications of France in country. He has taken upon himself the responsibility of entering into a treaty of commerce with England. His Majesty enlarges upon the advantages which this grand measure is likely to bring to both countries, and points out that it has but advanced the time of modification which each country would in the course of years have found it necessary to adopt, and given to indispensable reforms the character of reciprocal concessions. He goes on to allay the alliance of the two great peoples. His Majesty appeals to them for energetic measures in the adoption of laws which shall facilitate the peaceful working of the treaty. Provisions will be made to vastly protected France during the war, will not fail her in this pacific enterprise. The finance decree not to develop in proportion with her independence, the immense resources which Heaven has given her, acknowledging the truth as a maxim of humanity—viz., that the richer and more prosperous one country is the more she contributes to the riches and prosperity of others.

Four millions sterling to be thus expended within the next three years; which, with the annual credit of about twenty millions, to vastly devoted to the same purpose, will make a total of nearly six millions and a half sterling to be so applied in the time mentioned.

ITALY.

THE PROPOSED ITALIAN SETTLEMENT.

The Constitutionnel of Monday published a despatch of M. Thouvenel, dated the 31st of January last, which was addressed to the French Ambassador at Vienna, to be communicated to Count Rechberg. M. Thouvenel draws an historical outline of the useless endeavours of Austria to bring about a solution of the affairs of Central Italy, the inhabitants of these provinces having refused to recognise their former Sovereigns. M. Thouvenel appeals to the conciliatory spirit of Austria in favour of the English proposal. As regards the Romagna, M. Thouvenel expresses his regret that the Pope should have allowed the state of things in that province to become so aggravated. France would still, however, consent to a bare radical combination than that proposing the dismemberment of the States of the Church, on condition of the principle of non-intervention being maintained.

The Débats on Wednesday states that private information agrees with the accounts received by the Indépendance Belge respecting a proposal by Sardinia that Parma and Modena be annexed at once to Piedmont, and Tuscany be called upon to elect a new Sovereign—France supporting the claim of the Duke of Genoa, a child, five years old, nephew of the King Victor Emmanuel. The Indépendance hears that the Romagna, by the French proposition, would be under the nominal sovereignty of the Pope, but that the effective sovereignty would devolve upon the new Grand Duke of Tuscany. The Débats, however, says that the proposition named the Prince Napoleon as the King of Piedmont. According to both the Paris and the Brussels journals, the despatch is a French ultimatum, in which these proposals are made, was to be laid before the King of Piedmont on the 25th. If not accepted, the French troops were immediately to withdraw from Lombardy. The Débats alleges that the contents of the despatch referred to above show that the French Government "will formally maintain its well-known intentions as to the annexation of Savoy and Nice: that it will persist, and justly so, in considering it as a legitimate and necessary compensation for the territorial aggrandisement which Piedmont will obtain, and as an indispensable guarantee for the safety of the French frontier."

The London correspondent of the Débats says that Piedmont, represented to Count Cavour the heavy responsibility which would fall upon Italy and upon himself if hostilities were to arise. Cavour was endeavouring to make the state of affairs less threatening, she were to take steps for the annexation of Central Italy to Piedmont. It is said that, in consequence of these representations, the following the advice of France, all projects in reference to Central Italy are to be suspended for the present.

Letters from Rome affirm that the Pope has received a communication from the Emperor of the French, demanding the immediate of the retention of the Umbrian Marches by the Holy See, and proposing a treaty for their cession. The negative reply of his Holiness was couched in the strongest terms. The Papal army is likewise ready to meet all emergencies.

It is stated that the Cabinets of Berlin and St. Petersburg, in their reply to the English proposals for the settlement of the Italian question, have made common cause with the Vienna Court. A future Congress, after having been examined by a conference of the five great Powers. It is further said that M. Thouvenel, on receipt of these communications, told the Austrian Government would give its answer to them in concert with England.

By a Royal decree of Wednesday the electoral assemblies of Sardinia are convoked for the 25th of March, and Parliament is to meet on the 1st of April. Advocate Boncompagni will be a new senator. Victor Emmanuel has been the subject of a series of fêtes at the south of Piedmont and at Nice. Yesterday week he received a deputation of the Milanese clergy, who presented an address to him. The Archbishop of Milan, who presented, said the sentiments contained in the address, and was glad that the clergy agreed with him that spiritual authority should not interfere with political matters. The King replied that he had no fear of it.

"The presence of Lombardian sub-officers and private soldiers (writes the Turin correspondent of the Débats) having rendered it necessary to reunite with them the soldiers of the old provinces now on unlimited leave, in order to bring both classes into close union with their comrades, the Government has ordered the 15th different corps, and to make the instruction uniform. The King has, therefore, ordered that the men of the class of 1838 and 1839 will be called to be recalled to service."

The Government of Tuscany has, by a decree of the 23rd, fixed the form of the oath to be taken by the National Guard. It is as follows:—"I swear to be faithful to the King and to his Royal successors, loyally to observe the Statute, decrees, and other laws of the State, and to fulfil all my duties with the sole view of the prosperity and glory of the King and country."

The state of siege at Ceuta was granted to the 32rd ult., on which day Muley Abbas, accompanied by the Moorish Minister of Foreign Affairs, had an interview with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, had an interview with the Minister on the Tangier road. The Moors objected to the occupation of Tetuan, upon which General O'Donnell insisted. A further delay, asked for by the Moorish Minister, was refused. O'Donnell, who returned to Tetuan and immediately sent for the commander of the Spanish naval forces, in order to concert with him the future active operations. What these were may be gathered in part from the following telegraphic despatch, dated Madrid, Feb. 27:—"The Spanish garrison has been relieved at Larache and Arzila, causing great destruction in those two places. Some of the Spanish vessels were slightly damaged. Reinforcements are arriving daily." It is said that Rabat has been also bombarded." After performing this feat the Spanish squadron was expected to form a reserve to the Algesiras. Marshal O'Donnell's army was to march from Tetuan to Rabat about the end of the present week.

The Madrid journals state that the mail loss is killed and wounded of the Spaniards, since the beginning of the war in Morocco, is 5423.

It is to be hoped that the commercial community of China to mention that it has very generally condemned their conduct."

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT IN ITALY.

TURIN.

WITH so many chances in favour of a settlement of the "Italian question" there is now every reason to believe that such an event is more distant than ever. You have been already warned by me that the so-called compact between France and England was no compact at all; that there was the very vaguest possible understanding between them; and that, actually to avoid discussions so certain to elicit dissensions, they significantly eschewed touching upon the most essential of all the elements of a settlement—that is to say, they adverted to Savoy and Nice by conversation only, and left the question of votation in the Duchies undecided, whether it was to be exercised by universal suffrage of the people or a vote of the elected Chambers.

It was not difficult to foresee that this rope of sand was not destined to resist a strain, and already, even without a strain, it is broken. England continues to maintain the policy of annexation, and France, more obstinately than ever, declares it to be "impossible," and sees neither rest for herself nor peace for Italy save in following out the conditions of Villafranca. In one word, France will not accede to the condition of a strong kingdom of Piedmont; and, to mark the ungraciousness of such a decision, she has to couple the possibility of this event with an impracticable condition—the cession of Savoy and Nice. Affecting to have fears for her frontier in the event of Piedmont becoming a state of the second order, France declares that Savoy and Nice are essential to her own security! It would be the purest waste of time to refute a statement so puerile and gratuitous—a statement I have never yet found one single Frenchman stoop to corroborate. No; the whole policy stands out palpable and clear.

Piedmont, from a variety of causes, will always be a country well affected towards England. Her policy has ever been to attach herself to our side, and her leading men acknowledge no other principles of Government than those which prevail with us. All the late efforts of France have been to strengthen her alliances on the shores of the Mediterranean. Her policy in Spain has had this one sole object; and her "coquetting" with Naples sufficiently indicates how gladly she would wish to contrast her conciliatory tone with our sternness and severity. Now, strange as it may seem after all that France has done for Piedmont, she has neither succeeded in attaching the Sovereign nor the people to her cause; and at this very hour, with the exception of Austria, there is no country of Europe less popular in Piedmont than France. It is, therefore, for this reason the Emperor so strenuously opposes the aggrandisement of Piedmont, and declares the annexation of Tuscany and the Legations to be "impossible." It is well for us to see this matter in its true light, and recognise the fact that the policy of M. Thouvenel is the policy of M. Walewski, and that, come what may in the States of the Pope, the Emperor of the French is as decided as ever that Piedmont is not to become a State of formidable pretensions.

In the midst of complications, to which every day adds some new element, the rumour gains ground that a new war will open in spring. Even they who are most confident of this do not affect to explain how or between whom it is to be. One phrase alone repeated on every side seems to solve the difficulty to their minds. "A war only can settle everything," and with this dictum all appear satisfied. It may not give you a very high estimate of "Your Correspondent's" political wisdom if I own to you that I regard such an issue as by no means improbable.

To-day I have heard that a French corps-d'armée of 3000 men are to arrive at Leghorn and occupy stations in Tuscany and the other Duchies; some say, as a measure of precaution against a surprise by the Papal troops now concentrating near Arezzo; others aver that the step is preparatory to a restoration of the Grand Duke.

Rely, at all events, upon one thing: the Italian difficulty is exactly where it was, and the most clear-headed and far-seeing politicians here are no more able to predict the future than the dullest of their neighbours.

The Roxburgh Castle has arrived from Melbourne with £89,000 in gold.

Piccolomini is married. She sang on Saturday week at the Crystal Palace, and then left for Dublin, where the knot was tied. The happy possessor of the fascinating singing-bird is an Italian Prince, a Roman by birth, and a relative of one of the Cardinals.

At an early hour on Monday morning a violent gale of wind broke over the metropolis and suburbs and continued for several hours, causing not only injury to several persons, but a considerable amount of damage to the shipping in the river.

The cork trade in Portugal appears to be on the increase. The annual exportation now amounts to upwards of ten millions of francs. London alone each day consumes 10,000lb. of Portugese corks. The Portuguese cork is inferior to the French, but superior to that of Italy.

The land covered by forests in Algeria is not less than 1,200,000 hectares (nearly 4700 square miles), without including a great extent of country overrun with brushwood, which the Arabs set on fire occasionally, not only to drive away wild beasts, but also for the good browsing it affords their cattle when the shoots make their appearance the following spring.

THE AFFAIRS OF CHINA.—A series of letters, relating to the failure of the English naval forces on the Peiho, presented to the House of Lords by command of her Majesty, in pursuance of their address, dated February 21, 1860, was published on Tuesday. They bear upon the events which preceded and accompanied the failure of the English fleet in the before-named river.

MASSACRE OF A SHIP'S CREW.—We learn from Singapore that his Netherlands Majesty's steamer Onrust, lying in a narrow creek about five days' steaming above Bangermassing, on the 27th of December last, was attacked by about 600 men in a great number of prahus, who suddenly made their appearance from the creeks, so that the crew had not time to fire more than one shot, when the assailants were in possession of the vessel. After murdering all on board (seven officers and fifty men) they ran the vessel aground.

In consequence of the establishment of a telegraphic communication between Alexandria and India, news from India will now reach us in six days. The news from China and Australia will not be accelerated until India is connected by telegraph with Ceylon, when we shall have intelligence from Hong-Kong in twenty-two days, and from Melbourne in twenty-five days. There are about 140 telegraph stations in India—at Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, Delhi, Lucknow, Agra, Meerut, and all the principal cities and towns in Hindostan.

PARIS IMPROVEMENTS.—A new street, to be called the Rue du Louvre, is about to be commenced. It will start from the Rue St. Honoré and enter the Rue Montmartre, debouching in an open space at the junction. The length of the new street is to be 650 metres (upwards of 700 yards). In connection with this improvement is that of the Théâtre Français—the houses which now mask it are to be taken down and the theatre thrown open to the Rue St. Honoré. The house is to be enlarged and the approaches greatly improved. The space in front will be called the Place Napoleon.

A new screw-steam gun-vessel was launched last Saturday from the yard of Mr. Henry Pitcher, Northfleet. Her name is the Griffon, and her principal dimensions are as follows:—Length between perpendiculars, 145 feet 10 inches; length of keel for tonnage, 127 feet 10 inches; extreme breadth, 25 feet 4 inches; breadth for tonnage, 25 feet; moulded breadth, 24 feet 6 inches; depth in hold, 13 feet. Her burden is 425 tons. Her engines, by Napier, of Glasgow, are of 80-horse power. Her armament consists of one pivot-gun of 85lb., to throw a solid shot of eight inches diameter, and four brass 26lb. howitzers.

A SLAVER AT CHARLESTON.—A rakish, full-rigged brig reached Charleston on Wednesday, the 1st ult., from the coast of Lower Guinea, after a passage of forty days, in charge of Lieutenant R. M. M'Arann, Midshipman N. H. Farquhar, and ten marines and ten seamen of the United States' Navy. She was taken on the 21st of December last, after a twelve hours' chase, by the United States' ship Constellation, Commodore Inman, the brig then being on the coast of Guinea, about sixty miles north-west from Cabenda. She displayed no colours and no papers have been discovered on her. It is thought, from information obtained from the sailing-master, who had command of her when taken, that her name is the Delicia, a Spanish vessel, built in Barcelona some twenty-five years ago, and at present rather old, but a fast sailer. She sailed from Sagua la Grande, in the Island of Cuba, in September last, and in crossing the ocean for the African coast stood well to the north. She had been hove in near the land for several weeks previous to her capture, and, it is believed, was in momentary expectation of embarking a cargo of 600 negroes when she was taken. No money was found on board. A slave-deck, boilers for cooking, and all the necessary appliances, were found ready for immediate use. The captain or supercargo was on shore when the brig was taken, and he was consequently not captured. She had a crew of thirteen men, in addition to her officers, all of whom appeared to be Spaniards. The men were put on board the Constellation, but the first and second officers have been brought here in the brig. The vessel, &c., will be immediately placed in the hands of the United States' Marshal.—Charleston Courier.

A shoemaker's apprentice, of the name of Graves, recently hung himself in play at Worcester, in the presence of a fellow-workman whose back was turned at the time. The latter heard a scuffling sound, but took no notice of it, thinking it proceeded from Graves in sport, but on turning round a few minutes afterwards he found Graves suspended and dead.

The late fancy dress ball in St. George's hall, Liverpool, which was attended by 1417 persons, produced a profit of nearly £800. An inquest was held last week at Eastmeon, Hants, on the body of William Silk, aged thirty-eight. From the evidence it appeared that the deceased was in the habit of living on raw swedes, dry bread, and raw onions for weeks together, and had been known to go three weeks or a month without purchasing any animal food, butter, or cheese, and has been living in this state for years on purpose to save his money. He had saved nearly £200, and was only in the receipt of 8s. per week. Verdict—"Died from starvation."

THE NORTH-EASTERN REFORMATORY INSTITUTION held its annual meeting, at Newcastle, on Monday. From the report of the committee it appears that of the fifty-nine boys discharged, after completing their terms of detention, only seven have relapsed into crime; and of these one is of weak intellect, and another was a hardened criminal of eighteen when he was received into the institution. Fifty-two lads are engaged in honest employment, earning wages varying in amount from 3s. to 16s. per week. At the meeting a committee was appointed for the purpose of erecting and properly rigging ships' masts for the exercise and training of of the boys.

A TEA PARTY OF CHIMNEYSWEEPS AT BIRMINGHAM.—On Monday evening a social gathering of chimneysweeps and their wives took place at Birmingham, under the auspices of the Town Mission Society. The tea meeting was held at the Mission House, and was presided over by Alderman Cutler, several gentlemen who have actively interested themselves in the social improvement of the people being also present. The room was decorated for the occasion, and a plentiful supply of tea, cake, &c., was provided. Good order and harmony prevailed throughout the evening, and a vote of thanks to the chairman and the gentlemen who had supported him terminated the proceedings.

A DOUBLE SUICIDE occurred on Tuesday week at Easton, near Huntingdon. A couple named Saddington, both upwards of seventy years of age, who had lived many years in the village, were found drowned in a pond opposite their cottage, having nothing on but their night-dresses. An inquest was held the following morning, when it was stated that the deceased had been to the guardians at Huntingdon for relief, when they were told they might go into the union. This, it is supposed, preyed so much upon their minds as to cause them to commit suicide. It appears it was a premeditated act, as on the previous day they had disposed of their few articles of furniture, and paid off some debts owing in the village. The jury returned a verdict of "Found drowned."

THE WHITWORTH RIFLED CANNON.—The experiments with Mr. Whitworth's rifled cannon at Southport were continued on Wednesday and Thursday (last week). On Wednesday, with the 3-pounders and 12-pounders, at low elevations, the deviation from the line of fire was singularly small, and with the former, at an elevation even of 20 degs., the range was enormous, being in no case less than 6316 yards, and in most instances above 6500 yards. The deviation in the last-named series was, however, considerable, which may have been partly due to the wind at the time. On Thursday the range of this gun at 20 degs. elevation was equally great, and the deviation decidedly less. The 80-pounder, at an elevation of 10 degs., carried about 4400 yards, with an average deviation of twenty-seven yards. The public trials of these guns are now concluded, and Mr. Whitworth waits for an opportunity to be afforded him by Government of trying his inventions against those of Sir W. Armstrong.

CAPTURE OF GAMBLERS AT MANCHESTER.—Two extraordinary gambling cases were heard at the Manchester Police Court on Tuesday. Some days ago the police received information that a person named George Petts kept a gambling-house in Turner-street, and on Monday night Captain Palin, accompanied by several police officers, visited the premises. Four men were found playing at cards; £20 in silver lay on the table, and close by was a box containing dice. Two other persons were also found in the room, and all six were at once taken into custody—Petts on the charge of keeping a gambling-house, and the others on the charge of gambling. Petts was fined £100, with the alternative of three months' imprisonment; and a penalty of £5 was inflicted upon each of the remaining defendants, with the exception of a cigar-dealer, named Lippman Arensberg, who set up what Mr. Maude called a "lawful" excuse, and thus escaped with a fine of £2.——Similar charges were brought against Mr. Bartholomew Onley, a beerseller in Thomas-street, and eleven persons who were discovered in the house on Monday night, surrounded with all the accessories of gambling. Onley, like Petts, was fined £100, or, in default, three months' imprisonment; while the other defendants were mulcted in penalties ranging from £2 to £5, with the alternative of one month's imprisonment.

THE RECENT GALES.—There have been some serious disasters from the severe gales which prevailed in the early part of this week. The Nimrod steamer, which left Liverpool on Monday morning for Cork, was driven upon the rocks off St. David's Head, on the Pembrokeshire coast, on Tuesday morning, and went down in deep water. About thirty persons were on board, all of whom were drowned.—The damage done along the banks of the Thames was serious. Between Blackfriars and Southwark bridges, on the Surrey side, a lightning-conductor, attached by strong fastenings to a lofty shaft, was forced from its position and carried away, dragging with it a large portion of the brickwork. The storm seriously damaged many of the larger-sized vessels lying in midstream and along the wharves on the Middlesex and Surrey sides of the river. Many heavy crafts broke away from their powerful gear, and were drifted a considerable distance. At Bromley Cut a boy, named George White, was playing upon the deck of a barge, when a gust of wind whirled him into the water, and he was drowned.—From all parts of the country there are accounts of buildings blown down and trees torn up. Much damage has been done to the shipping in the northern ports. The gale inflicted considerable injury upon the various pole-lines of telegraph. Not only in this country, but throughout the Continent, the lines have been interrupted, partly by posts being blown down, partly by trees falling on the wires, and hurling poles and wires together to the earth.

The parish church of Othery, near Bridgewater, has recently been ornamented with a handsome stained-glass window in its north transept, in addition to five painted windows in the chancel, and one in the priest's vestry; the whole of them entirely at the cost of a munificent lady resident in the neighbourhood.

A memorial window has just been placed at the west end of the south aisle in the ancient parish church of Mottram-in-Longdendale, Cheshire, in memory of Captain George Kershaw Sidebottom, of the 5th Dragoon Guards, who died on board the Europa on his way home from the Crimea, on the 20th of July, and was interred at Gibraltar, on the 23rd of July, 1855, aged twenty-four years.

Cadman, Rector of Trinity Church, Marylebone.

The Hurkaru of the 26th of January states that the Bishop of Calcutta has reached Allahabad. Since the visitation commenced confirmations have been held at Berhampore, Rampore, Beauleah, Bhaugulpore, Monghyr, Dinapore, Buxar, Ghazeepore, Chunar, Benares, and Allahabad; 123 confirmations were in the English language, and 58 in the Hindoo.

THE MALTA PROTESTANT COLLEGE.—We are requested to correct an error which appeared in part of our impression on the 17th of December last. "The meetings attended by the Earl of Shaftesbury, at Liverpool and Manchester, on behalf of the Malta College, were not for the purpose of paying off a debt of £10,000, but of paying off a debt of £2880, and of enlarging the operations of the college, and placing it on a satisfactory footing commensurate with the great objects it has in view," for which purposes a reserve fund of £10,000 is sought to be raised.

LORD ELGIN AND SIR M. SEYMOUR.

The official correspondence relative to the differences in China between Lord Elgin and Admiral Sir Michael Seymour has been published.

In a despatch dated "H.M.S. Furious, Gulf of Pechili, 23rd of April, 1858," Lord Elgin reports the inconvenience which had been occasioned by the failure of Rear-Admiral Sir M. Seymour to carry out the arrangements which had been made to ensure the presence of a fleet of gun-boats off the Peiho to support the demands made by his Excellency on the Chinese Government. Lord Elgin communicated to the French, Russian, and American Ambassadors his intention of advancing within the bar of the Peiho with the gun-boats, and adds:—"On the 3rd of April, however, two days after the dispatch of the communications in question, the Coromandel, tender to the flag-ship, arrived at Shanghai, conveying the very perplexing intelligence that not only had Sir M. Seymour put off his own departure from Hong-Kong from the 16th, the date mentioned in his letter of the 2nd of March to me, to the 25th ult., but that no preparations for the immediate dispatch of gun-boats for the north seemed to be in progress at the time of her sailing. I gathered this information from the verbal reports of the officers of the ship, for on neither point did I hear from Sir M. Seymour." Lord Elgin then states that he was obliged to desist from his intended expedition, and expresses his opinion that had he been enabled to push on he would have brought the Imperial Government to terms. A second despatch of Lord Elgin is dated April 29, 1858. At that time Sir M. Seymour had arrived at the Gulf of Pechili:—"It is with a degree of surprise, which I have difficulty in describing, that I learn from the information which he has now for the first time furnished to me that his arrangements are so made that the very inadequate force which he is about to supply will not arrive here until the approach of the season when the climate is most favourable to the European constitution. No explanation of the cause of this most grievous disappointment has been given to me, and I do not trust myself to hazard a conjecture on the subject." Lord Elgin says, in conclusion, that the British force in the China seas is sufficient to carry out the policy of Government, but "it is indispensable that those who control the material force of Great Britain in this quarter should lend to those who direct its diplomacy a vigorous and intelligent support."

Sir Michael Seymour replies in a long despatch, addressed to the Admiralty:—"Before leaving Hong-Kong I had made every inquiry respecting the navigation of the Gulf of Pechili, and had come to the conclusion, which I had hoped to have communicated to Lord Elgin at Shanghai, that the end of April would be sufficiently early for her Majesty's ships to assemble off the Peiho, to carry on operations with effect, and the fact of the Calcutta having carried away her mainyard in the still strong north-east wind, while crossing the Gulf on the 23rd of April, sufficiently proves the correctness of my opinion. Even after the 10th of May there were many days during which it was quite impracticable for the gun-boats to carry on active operations. . . . . Had Lord Elgin waited my arrival at Shanghai, I should have been able to learn his Excellency's wishes, and to have made the necessary arrangements for carrying out any intended operations; but no later than the 10th of April his Lordship, acting on the verbal reports of the subordinate officers of my flag tender, and knowing I must be close at hand (I arrived three days afterwards), proceeded with the small force then at Shanghai to the Gulf of Pechili, and, having arrived there on the 14th, finds, according to his Lordship's own admission, that the force was inadequate for making any movement in advance, so that the only object attained was the placing me in a false position, by taking my ships from under my orders, and giving to the Chinese an undue knowledge of our approach." Sir Michael Seymour enters into the whole question at great length in his reply.

On this document the Admiralty expresses the following opinion:—"This answer has been fully considered by their Lordships, and they think it due to the high character and the long and distinguished services of Sir M. Seymour to state their opinion that such answer to the charges and imputations of Lord Elgin is complete and satisfactory."

It is stated that a movement is now in progress for the purpose of offering a testimonial to Mr. Wakley, the Coroner for the county of Middlesex, and originator of the Lancet newspaper.

Larache and Arzilla, lately bombarded by the Spanish fleet, are two small ports on the Atlantic coast. The latter is a town of about a thousand inhabitants, eleven leagues south-west of Tangier, and is defended by only one fort. Larache has from time immemorial been the ordinary station of the Emperor of Morocco's fleet.

THE SWORDFISH.—A proof of the extraordinary power of the swordfish may be seen in the Arab, engaged in the African trade, and now undergoing repairs at Bristol. The fish appears to have driven its sword through a double sheathing of copper, a plank 2½ inches thick, and deep into one of the ship's timbers, when the weapon broke short off.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—The General Committee met on Tuesday week and selected various sub-committees, which commenced sitting on Thursday. Two of these—the Weymouth and the Carlisle—came to their decision last Tuesday. In both cases the sitting members—Viscount Grey de Wilton and Mr. Brooks for the former place, and Sir James Graham and Mr. Lawson for the latter—were sustained in their seats. In the Carlisle case application was made for costs, but they were not granted.

LITERATURE.

Twelve Years in China. By a British Resident. Constable and Co., Edinburgh.

This is a valuable contribution towards the better understanding o a question which has recently assumed an importance not too accu rately, as we fear, estimated by either the Government or the public Mr. Scarth, the writer of the book, states that, in the absence o public information regarding late events in China, excepting from persons whose views would naturally, if not inevitably, be affected by the policy adopted by our Government, it seemed to him a duty in the present crisis to narrate his experience during a residence of twelve years in that country, and the opinions he was led to form. In the light in which events appeared to him they assumed a very different colour from that in which they have been painted by others. In order to judge of the fitness of the author to offer himself as a guide for public opinion on this subject it ought to be known that from the year 1847, when he first arrived in China, until late in 1859, he was not merely a resident at one of the British settlements on the outside border of the Celestial Empire, but, in the pursuit of business and health, or impelled by curiosity, he penetrated further into the interior (assuming the dress of a native for that purpose, even to the extent of shaving his head and wearing a tail of unimpeachable pretensions) than most foreigners have, even of late years, been enabled to do, and he thus had opportunities of seeing much of the people and the country. It is apparent from his work that he has, with no little success, broken out of that routine-life which makes it quite possible for a person to reside long in China and yet know very little about it. He repudiates the notion that Government interpreters are the best authorities on Chinese affairs; and it will be found that, in that criticism of Lord Elgin's proceedings in the negotiation of the treaty of Tien-Tsin which he very boldly produces and very elaborately argues out in the volume before us, he lays it down that the vital error committed by our Plenipotentiary was his blind acceptance of the advice and the views of two gentlemen of that class. Indeed, he goes so far as to assert that Mr. Wade and Mr. Lay, the officials in question, were the actual framers of the treaty, while they were certainly the chief inspirers of the measures by which it was preceded. It will be gathered from this hint that that portion of the work which is devoted to an examination of the most recent events in China is not favourable to the course pursued by our Plenipotentiary; while much of his conduct is actually impeached. Some articles of the treaty are declared to be so incompatible with Chinese feelings and habits that it is to be doubted whether it can be carried out; and it is urged that it is not easy to see any good results to arise from Lord Elgin's mission if the treaty be not carried out in its integrity, especially as it is asserted that Lord Elgin left China without having brought any point to a definite conclusion. It may be stated, in passing, that Mr. Scarth fully espouses the cause of Sir Michael Seymour in the controversy which is going on between Lord Elgin and the gallant Admiral. In considering this work, and the opinions which it lays down, it must be particularly observed that the details of the author's personal experience, and his account of the manners, habits, and feelings of the Chinese, lead up naturally to the formation of those opinions and the enunciation of his views. Every question relating to the piercing of the Chinese Empire by the foreigner (including that of coolie emigration) is dealt with; and, if there be some who may be disposed to differ with him as to the skill and wisdom of our diplomatic proceedings, few, we fancy, after perusing some of the statements in this work, will refuse to admit that any military operations which it may be deemed necessary to carry on must be conducted on a scale far larger, and on the principle of not despising an enemy, to a much greater extent than has hitherto been the case.

Napoleon III. on England. Edited and Translated by John Hawkins Simpson. Saunders and Otley.

This is a series of selections from the writings of the Emperor of the French, and the object of their publication is stated to be whether we can, from reflections made and committed to paper during his exile, form any decided opinion as to his real sentiments and intentions with respect to England. The aim of the volume is to put it in the power of every Englishman calmly to consider this question, and to answer it for himself. With this intention those passages which have direct or indirect reference to this country have been selected, without any attempt to favour any preconceived opinions of the editor. It seems to us that Mr. Simpson takes a sensible and practical view when he asserts that Englishmen are too apt to regard the rule of the Emperor in France from an English point of view. They do not consider that the two countries have neither the same character, the same manners, nor the same nature: the same words in each country would represent two things totally opposed to each other. By making this error the starting-point of their reasoning they are at once misled, and, being so far misled, they proceed in their course of error when they come to consider the nature of the feelings and the probable intentions of the Emperor towards this country. In the writings of Louis Napoleon, published at considerable intervals, and under very varied circumstances, there is certainly little or any symptom of hostility towards England; indeed, rather the reverse. He constantly expresses his admiration of her constitutional government, her power of public opinion, her freedom of the press, and even his great respect for her Protestant religion. That he has been no unthinking student of the salient points of our history is shown in the volume before us; for in the "Historical Fragments" considerable space is devoted to an examination of that portion of English history to the workings and the transitions of which we are apt to attribute our political condition at the present moment. Although there is much that is borrowed from Guizot (which, by the way, is not at all concealed) in these lucubrations, it is evident that even Macaulay hardly took a more enthusiastic view of the spirit and operation of our Revolution of 1688, nor was a more ardent believer in the wisdom, skill, and patience with which William III. aided to build up that edifice of free and constitutional government which was the result of that important event. It will not be without use to study and consider this evidence of the feelings and opinions of Louis Napoleon in connection with the circumstances of the present moment; and if we are inclined to question his ruling idea that the first Napoleon was in reality desirous of being the head pacificator of Europe, and was only thwarted in his intentions by the blunders and mistakes of the rulers of the other Powers with regard to his wishes and hopes, yet there is something to be gathered from the adoption of this, the "Napoleonic, idea" by the present Sovereign of France, and we can only trust that he will sincerely attempt to put into action that which he declares to be an idea of peace rather than an idea of war; an idea of order and of reconstruction rather than an idea of overthrow, and which is intended to develop the grand principles of justice, of authority, and of liberty.

Biography and Criticism. Routledge, Warne, and Co.

This is a second series of a work entitled "Eminent Men and Popular Books," and which consisted of reprints of essays published in the Times newspaper. It is intended, like the former volume, for popular reading, and comprises such articles only of recent biography and literary criticism as are presumed from their subjects to be generally interesting. The mode in which the Times deals with its literary department is almost peculiar to itself as a daily journal. Every now and then there is a gigantic burst of review of some work which has acquired prominence before the world, and these criticisms are founded a good deal on the model of those essays which in the earlier days of the Edinburgh and the Quarterly were the groundwork of a species of literarly exercitation on the part of writers who, in after life, having become distinguished in connection with books or living action, which tended to the adorning and perpetuating of their names, have from time to time reproduced their essays from the shade of the anonymous. In the present instance the publishers have not waited for the attainment by the authors of that fame which is born of publicity, but have trusted to the merits of the essays alone in order to rescue them from the comparative obscurity into which they would necessarily have fallen when confined to the fugitive columns of a newspaper. Some of the treatises now collected appeared as early as 1855, and the latest (a review of William Russell's Diary in India) is dated January, 1860. The most taking on the face of them are the dissertations on "James Watt," "Mrs. Elliott's Narrative of the First French Revolution," "Memoirs of Sir Robert Peel," "Lord Cockburn's Memorials of His Time," and that entitled "Mrs. Fitzherbert." It is very probable that a great many readers of newspapers are prone to make their daily journal an accompaniment to their breakfast, and do not afterwards recur to its perusal. To most of such persons an essay occupying a page of the Times has rather a formidable aspect, and is probably passed over with the good intention of reading it on some more convenient occasion, which in the very nature of things scarcely ever arrives. To such persons the production of the volume before us will be welcome, for it will come within the compass of those hours which are devoted to books as contradistinguished from daily journals, and will address itself to sympathies which are not often in action when one is hastily devouring that which is emphatically called news. It is quite certain that it is praiseworthy to attempt to rescue from the oblivion inseparable from the ephemeral nature of their first publication a series of essays which are, in a more or less degree, admirable specimens of literary power and critical acumen.

"PLAYFULNESS," A STATUETTE IN THE BRITISH INSTITUTION, BY G. HALSE.—SEE PAGE 209.

Memorials of Workers. By George Godwin, F.R.S. Hardwicke.

This little volume contains a lecture which was read by Mr. Godwin at the Architectural Museum, South Kensington, and it is designated as an attempt to cause the past to encourage the present. The author, as he must now be called, begins by stating that he has been occasionally requested to correspond with men of the humbler classes who are struggling onward—men who desire to cultivate the powers with which they are endowed, who have aspirations beyond their position, and, in many cases, courage and energy to carry them out if they could assure themselves that success was probable. The fear, however, with which they are possessed that, work as they may, there is no chance of advancing relaxes their endeavours and keeps them down. It is to such men that the obvious advice is, "Recollect what others have done who were as ill placed as yourself, and who laboured under equal if not greater difficulties; that their number is not small; that they may be pointed to in every pursuit and every branch of human knowledge." It was from this text that Mr. Godwin spoke to those whom he desired to assist and encourage; and he adduces in a plain but not ungraceful manner numerous illustrations of the successful doers and workers under difficulties. Beginning with Bernard Palissy, he mentions among others Quintin Matsys, Arkwright, Samuel Crompton, Jacquard, Brindley, Watt, George Stephenson, and numerous others whose names are not so obvious to the choice, but the account of whose lives add immense force and value to his argument. We are glad to see that in a note allusion is made to two or three books dealing with the same class of facts which have appeared since this address was first sketched, and especially to Mr. Smiles's book, "Self-help," which occurred to us the moment we opened Mr. Godwin's little volume. Small as it is, it will worthily take its place in that class of practical literature to which it belongs.

The Odes of Horace. By Theodore Martin. J. W. Parker and Son.

This is a hearty effort to render into English verse the odes of Horace, and the translation is accompanied by a life of the poet and copious notes. The object of the translator has been to convey to the mind of an English reader the impression, as nearly as may be, which the originals produce upon his own. The difficulties of such a task are fully admitted. The dictum of Shelley—"that it is impossible to represent in another language the melody of versification, and that even the volatile strength and delicacy of the ideas escape in the crucible of translation"—is quoted with approbation, and it is acknowledged that no competent translator can satify himself, and still less can he expect to satisfy others, and that it is easy to demonstrate that Horace is untranslatable. The whole case, in fact, against this new attempt is fairly stated, and nothing is deduced as an argument against it, except that which every one is willing to receive, that with the translator, as with all those who have preceded him, this has been a labour of love, not undertaken with any view to a complete version, but which, in the course of time, has imperceptibly grown up into even such a volume as that before us. Mr. Martin, as is well known, possesses, as a versifier, a remarkable imitative faculty, and is master of a copious storehouse of language and imagery. Nevertheless, it is to be doubted whether these are exactly the qualities which go towards an adequate dealing with such a poet as Horace. In this case no power of parody can be brought into play, and Mr. Martin has very conscientiously abstained from yielding to any temptation into which the possession of that peculiar capability may have led him. He has, with praiseworthy care and diligence, sought to catch the tone of his author, and striven earnestly to infuse the charm of his manner into English verse. Once or twice he has, perhaps, failed in his effort to be "light without being flippant, and to be playful without being vulgar," but, on the whole, he has showed much of the delicacy of touch which is demanded by a work like this, and which he has proved not to be quite so hopeless of attainment as he himself thinks. How far he has got over the main difficulty in a translation of this kind it is not for us to say. That difficulty seems to be this: that for the classical scholar, and one who can and does appreciate Horace, no translation is necessary or desirable: while to enable the mere English reader to believe that the poet has a right to all the merits and charms which are claimed for him by those who can steep themselves in the original is a task for the performance of which there are no corresponding materials in the two languages.

Corayda and other Poems. By Ernest Jones. Kent and Co.

When Mr. Ernest Jones first appeared before the public in the character of a poet some surprise was felt that a leader of Chartists should give eminent proofs that he was a scholar, a man of refined literary taste, and a gentleman. It is likely that few persons have recognised the fact that it is probably the very ideality of Chartism which gave it its charm for Mr. Ernest Jones, and that in his quality of a demagogue and an agitator he may have found a vent for the enthusiasm and even the romance of his temperament. To his former productions due merit has been awarded by the critical world, and we think that the appeal which he makes to the public in the present volume will be responded to with equal favour. In the first poem of the collection, which is "A Tale of Faith and Chivalry," there is no pretension, but much that is musical in the verse, and the evolvement of the slightest of stories is graceful enough; while here and there are to be found, we will not say bursts, for they are hardly that, but gleams of thought and diction which are eminently poetical. In the detached pieces there is less calmness than in the more ambitious poems, but not the less natural evidences of emotion and passion. Indeed, in one or two instances, in a few eager stanzas, and even lines, the writer rises to a point which goes far to show the genuineness of the poetic inspiration within him.

A Vision of Barbarossa, and other Poems. By W. Stigant. Chapman and Hall.

The writer of these poems is a man of erudition, a man of no little imagination, has great command of language, and is capable of impression by circumstances and things from a poetical point of view, which go very far to justify the publication of the volume before us. Nevertheless, it is doubtful whether he has established a right to demand for himself a character beyond that of a careful, a full, an illustrative, but rather unimpassioned versifier. There are in all the poetical pieces which are contained in Mr. Stigant's volume marks that he is trembling on the very verge of being a poet; but, nevertheless, he has not actually plunged into the Pierian spring. As a specimen of his command of rhythm, and of his powers of versification, we may point to the opening lines of the poem entitled "Samson and Delilah;" while for a burst of vigorous and indignant satire commend us to the stanzas headed "Urbs Adumbrata." It is not by any means intended to convey here an idea that Mr. Stigant has thrown away his time in the composition of this volume of verse. Far from it; it exhibits the fruits of a powerful mental exercitation in a shape which is often pleasing and never offensive; and really, when one compares it with the bulk of that cataract of verse which, day by day, deluges those who perforce are standing in its midst, the perusal of these poems have not only been a relief but a consolation. It may be added that, in common with the author of the volume last noted, Mr. Stigant has several translations from the German, and it is worth looking at the rendering of Uhland's "Minstrel's Curse" by himself and Mr. Ernest Jones respectively.

NEW CATHEDRAL AT MONTREAL.

THIS building, which is unquestionably the most beautiful specimen of ecclesiastical architecture in Canada, if not on the American Continent, has recently been opened for Divine service. It was designed by Mr. F. Wills (late of Salisbury), and is on the cruciform plan. It consists of nave and aisles, 112 feet long and 70 feet wide; transepts, 100 feet across tower, and 25 feet wide; tower, 20 feet square; and choir, 46 feet long and 28 feet wide, with aisle for organ-chamber. The spire rises to a height of 224 feet. Connected with the choir is the robing-room and clerk's room; and half detached from this the octagonal building, containing chapter-house, diocesan library, &c. Internally the nave, 67 feet high, has an open roof, the timbers of which are worked and carved. Two ranges of columns and arches separate the nave from the aisles. The capitals of these columns are elaborately carved and designed from Canadian plants. The four end arches of the nave spring from sculptured heads representing the four Evangelists. The ceiling of the choir is elaborately illuminated in blue and vermilion, and sparpied with golden stars. The wheel window (seen in the Engraving) is in coloured glass (the gift of the school children), and also the four small windows underneath, representing the four major prophets (these are the gift of the Hon. G. Moffat). The whole of the windows in the clerestory of the choir are in coloured glass (the gift of the clergy of the diocese). The altar-window (also given) is of the most chaste and elegant description, executed by Clayton and Bell, London. The transept windows, and the windows in the ends of the aisles, are also of painted glass (the gift of various members of the congregation). The pews are all low, with carved ends, and without doors. The stalls on each side of the choir are elaborately carved. The reredos is laid with Minton's encaustic tiles (chocolate-coloured ground, with the fleur-de-lis in green). On one side of the altar are the sedilia for the clergy, of exquisite workmanship. Three arched canopies, on polished stone columns, surmount the seats. At either side are busts of the Queen and the Bishop of the diocese. Over the arches is carved, and the letters illuminated, "Oh, worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness." The font is a beautiful specimen of stone carving, executed in England. The organ, by Hill, of London, is in course of erection; and the clock and peal of bells are in course of manufacture, also in England. The church is built of Montreal bluestone, with dressings of soft colite imported expressly from Caen. The entrance-porch (seen in the Engraving) is a beautiful specimen of stone carving. It is in contemplation to erect a handsome throne for the Bishop in the choir.

CHRISTCHURCH CATHEDRAL, MONTREAL.

From various causes it has been thought better to defer the ceremony of consecration of the cathedral for a few months. It was, however, opened for Divine service on Advent Sunday. The morning service—in which the Dean, the Archdeacon, Canon Leach, and other clergy took part, the Lord Bishop preaching—was impressively performed, and the Holy Communion administered to a large number. There was also full service in the afternoon, at which the Dean preached. The evening service, which is on the plan of St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, &c., being entirely free, was thronged long before the service commenced, and apparently not only by those who went from mere curiosity. The singing, led by a choir of men and boys (amateurs), was such that the whole congregation were able to join. The Archdeacon preached a most eloquent sermon. As this was the first attempt at a free evening service on the plan of the London cathedrals, it was extremely satisfactory to see so large a number avail themselves of the privilege. After the Evening Hymn was sung, to Talbis's canon, the Bishop pronounced the Benediction.

Christchurch cathedral has received many valuable presents from well-wishers in England, including a magnificent altar-cloth, lectern, service-books, &c. The cost of the building is estimated at about £35,000 sterling.

BOLOGNA.

As Bologna is now the centre of the Italian movement, we give a View of the exterior of the city, which, like the majority of Italian cities, offers a rich and picturesque outline. Bologna stands next to Rome in population and importance. It is situated in a plain north of the Apennines, is surrounded by walls, and has twelve gates. It contains, which are numerous many of them of vast size, with three or four different courts), and in a good style of architecture, especially those of brick with terra cotta is remarkable for its fine palaces, ornamentation. Among the best we may name Palazzi Bevilacqua, Fava, Magnani, Bentivoglio, and the house of the Caracci; the latter a building doubly interesting from its architecture, and having been inhabited by the painters Caracci. Many noble families reside in these palaces.

VIEW OF BOLOGNA, SHOWING THE TOWERS ASINELLI AND GARISENDA.

The great square is very picturesque, and always full of animation. In it stands the Palazzo del Pubblico, a fine building, the residence of the Cardinal Legate, and the seat of the various courts of justice. In this square is the fine fountain with the colossal statue of Neptune by Giovanni di Bologna.

Perhaps the great and peculiar features of the city are the arcaded streets, nearly every street, in fact, being so. The chief of them are built of brick and terra cotta, and many are exceedingly rich and effective. In a general way, owing to their height, and the climate, they do not obstruct the light so much as might be imagined, and as shelter from the sun and rain are most acceptable. One is naturally reminded by these of the ever-town of Chester, though the latter carriers off the palm for the picturesque. The twin Towers Asinelli and Garisenda, standing close together in the centre of the city, are a very remarkable feature of Bologna (they appear on the right hand in the View). Asinelli, so called from its founder, is very nearly 400 feet high—upwards of three times the height of St. Paul's—and is slightly out of the perpendicular: but Garisenda, its neighbour, not half the height, looking as though suddenly shocked in its growth, inclines on one side about nine feet. This inclination, it is said, like that of the Tower of Pisa, was the result of a subsidence of the ground under the foundations. The strange and fearful effect it produces is alluded to by Dante in the "Inferno." It has been fancifully observed that Bologna, seen from the neighbouring hills, has in its outline the appearance of a vessel with one mast, represented by the Tower Asinelli, while the more inclined Garisenda represents the chains.

The University of Bologna is the oldest and still one of the most celebrated in Italy. It dates its origin from Theodosius II. Medicine has the best-filled chairs. This University boasts of having had several celebrated female professors. The Medici family of Bologna are many: the chief is San Petronio, magnificent, but unfinished. On the pavement is a meridian line drawn by the astronomer Cassini. The ceremonies that take place in this church are most elaborate. In the churches and galleries are many fine pictures, chiefly of the Bolognese school. The names of a few of the names of their school is sufficient:—Francia, Primaticcio, Tibaldi, Guido, Domenichino, Chino, the Caracci, Guercino. There is a head by the latter said to have been painted in a night. The men of Bologna are fine-looking, manly and lightbearted, and certainly the best independent portion of the Papal States, and a considerable amount of information exists among the educated classes. The women are good-looking, but in Bologna is a thriving, industrious, wealthy city. It numbers some 70,000 souls.

The account of Bologna would be incomplete did we not mention the large sausages, so well known by their nickname mortadella. Their reputation is world-wide.

The Company has been created to construct a Railway from the City of Buenos Ayres to San Fernando, a distance of 18 miles. The Concession confers the following privileges:—

1st. The exclusive right of constructing a Railway for the period of 99 years.

2nd. The grant of about 12 acres of land for Stations in the city of Buenos Ayres, the towns of Belgrano and San Fernando, and a Station and Depôt at the intermediate village of Barracas.

3rd. The right to import, free of duty, all rails, machinery, rolling stock, and other materials required for the construction and maintenance of the Railway, as well as coal, coke, stores, and provisions.

4th. All the Property of the Company (movable and immovable) is declared free from Municipal taxation during the term of the Concession.

5th. The works can be discontinued for a term not exceeding 18 months, and it is only necessary to complete the Railway within 3 years.

The Company has also acquired the interest in the Steam Navigation Company connected with the line, build stations, supply the fixed and rolling stock, and all other necessaries, and work the whole for the remunerative working order, on or before the 1st of July, 1861, and maintain the same in like condition for one year after completion, for the sum of £195,000, to be paid in Shares and Debentures, and ultimately to receive £15,000 in Shares, and £5,000 in Debentures, as the remuneration for their services.

The remunerative character of railway traffic in the Continent has been fully established by the experience of many years, and the Directors believe that the Shares will command a good premium.

The Buenos Ayres line (the only railway now in Buenos Ayres) has been partially opened to the public, and the Directors have every reason to anticipate a most remunerative traffic.

It appears probable that the local traffic of this line will largely surpass that of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, when the population of Buenos Ayres, which increases on the principle of Government premiums, places their chief reliance upon the immigrant and consequently increases at a rapid rate.

The Directors have entered into a contract with responsible parties for the Shares (as part payment of the deposit of £2 10s. per share; the balance, if any, must be paid on application), which they consider may amount to a further premium of about £2 per share.

Detailed prospectuses and forms of applications for shares may be obtained of the Brokers and Secretary, at the Offices, 3, Bond-court, Walbrook, E.C.

By order of the Board,
THOMAS BELL, Secretary.

This Company is formed for the purpose of purchasing and enlarging the premises well known as the West Cliff Hotel, Folkestone, and advantageous arrangements have been made with the Proprietors of the Folkestone Pier for the conveyance of the Dover Mail Packets and Mr. Woodthorpe's saloons, and to take a large portion of the passenger-traffic to and from the Continent, which is expected to be largely increased by the new line, when such portion of the traffic as may be required will be provided for.

A first-class connection has already been secured to this hotel, as testified by the books, which, for the last two years, have been open to the inspection of the Directors, and which for the time have been borne by the present proprietor, or that a well-established business has been carried on during the whole of that period.

The Directors have much pleasure in stating that the terms on which the premises are to be purchased are most satisfactory, and very large profits upon the capital thereon have been realised; it is, therefore, confidently expected that the Shareholders will receive a large and remunerative dividend on their investment, and that the property will be secured to the Company before the accommodation is increased; and the Directors of this Company believe that the West Cliff Hotel will be found a most desirable investment to shareholders and others.

The present premises are held upon lease for 28 years from Christmas, 1859, at the low rent of £100 per annum, and the Directors have the option of purchasing the freehold at the end of the first seven years, at a valuation to be made by two valuers, one to be appointed by the lessee, and other clerks and laying out the accumulated proceeds to the Holder; and for carrying on the business of a public hotel, and at our hands Directors have the option of purchasing the business providing entirely Coffee, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, together with a handsome Coffee-room, and a Ladies' Drawing-room, and Private Apartments.

The books of the present proprietor will be open to every one applying for shares, and if profit is thought proper to be divided will be declared at the General Meeting of Shareholders, to be held in the month of August next, and thereafter at the same period in each of the time of payment of the first dividend.

The Deed of Settlement of the Shareholders is proposed to be carried out by the Directors, and the Shares will be issued in the order in which the deposits are paid, and the payments from Shareholders who may at any time wish the Hotel. This arrangement, being open, is a better answer, proposed to be made, than the ordinary system of first calling the value of his investment, whilst at the same time the interests of the remaining Shareholders will be protected by the Deed of Settlement.

The unsolicited kind encouragement which has been given for the purpose, induced the contemplated addition and alteration of the opposite property, more especially as the hotel will become a portion of a very handsome terrace, which the Directors have reason to anticipated, a Special General Meeting of Shareholders will be convened for the consideration of the Deed of Settlement, and for the election of Directors, when the auditor's report will be presented, and the Directors will then retire by rotation.

The directors propose to enter into arrangements with the London bridge Railway Company, by which they will obtain a view of embarkation and disembarkation between the two companies, which will result in great advantage to the non-residents of both Companies.

Applications for shares may be made to the Secretary at the Offices of the Company.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 1860.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL introduced his Reform Bill on Thursday evening. The measure, which is of a very simple character, proposes to make the county franchise to consist of a £10 occupation, and to reduce the present borough franchise to £6. He preserves the present rating clauses, but makes the payment of poor rates only, and not that of assessed taxes, necessary to the attainment of a vote. He proposes to take away one of the two existing members from twenty-five small boroughs having a population below 7000, and he gives those members to fifteen populous towns unrepresented, and the remainder to Kensington and Chelsea, Birkenhead, Stalybridge, and Burnley, which are erected into boroughs; and an addition of one member is made to the representation of Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham. Altogether the total number of persons added to the elective constituencies by the adoption of the new franchise will be above 634,000, which, he stated, would include a great number of the working classes, and on discussion, the addition of that very earnestly desired, would tend to add strength to the Constitution of this country.

MR. MACKINNON'S bill, which has the laudable object of trying the experiment of Conciliation Courts, before which the disputes between master and workman might be discussed, without recourse to the tribunals of law, was detailed on Wednesday. Cold water was thrown on the plan by Sir George Lewis, and the bill itself may be in many respects defective. Yet the great success of these useful Courts in France surely suggests a favourable hearing of their advocate. Mr. Blanchard Jerrold, who, at the wish of Lord Brougham, has been investigating the subject in Paris, for the purpose of lecturing on it in England, states that out of 80,000 cases, large or small, that come before the prudhommes in a year, but 8000 are taken to the Courts of Conciliation, which is a sort of arbitration—surely the most rational way of settling quarrels.

Our Queen has had the satisfaction of welcoming home again her gallant young midshipman, Prince Alfred, who has returned from Lisbon, where the Royal Highness may be considered doubly fortunate in having escaped the terrific gale of Tuesday, which raged fearfully round the coasts as well as inland, and which has caused enormous destruction, and in a few cases—we hope that later advices may contradict the report—loss of human life—has occasioned loss of life. It departed as suddenly as it came, and the twenty-ninth of February, a sort of noticable date from its infrequent intrusion upon us, was as fine and calm a day as could be desired. The gale will be a remembered feature of one of the most curiously variable winters on record.

Lord Palmerston deserves all credit for having offered the vacant mire of Rochester to Dr. Vaughan, the late Master of Harrow, though, contrary to the hopes of those who know how valuable a man had been selected for elevation, that estimable clergyman has said nolo episcopari in earnest. In times like these a hierarch should be, in the best sense, a member of the Church militant, and missionary; and Dr. Vaughan was likely to have administered excellently the important diocese at present waking as overlooker—one who has to look, from the chair of Gundulph, over the whole of Hertfordshire and nearly all Essex. "Tis a great charge," if we may quote such a personage as Dame Quickly in connection with we know not what a subject. "Tis the see (since Bury's) is proverbially a small one; perhaps those who parcelled out the diocese had other views than the duty of Bishops than those now held by the real friends of the Church.

A Parliament will be formed for three hours and a half whether Sir James Graham and his colleague should continue to sit for Carlisle. The decision was finally given in favour of those gentlemen. It is due to the character of a leading statesman to add that neither lawyers, clergymen, nor gentlemen of the very drumpery care of alleged bribery—in fact it did not, in its strongest aspect, deserve the name—should have occupied the Committee twenty minutes. The charge was, that on the complaint of an humble voter that some men in his employ had neglected their work for the election he was compensated to the extent of their day's wages, some shillings. It would have been perfectly ridiculous to permit such an act, even if it had been performed by Sir James himself, to disqualify the member chosen by Carlisle. Lord Grey de Wilton and Mr. Brooke, the Conservative members for Weymouth, have also been declared rightfully seated. The only other incident in the domestic history of Parliament is the passing of the Bill to give Right of Supremacy to take part in an Irish election when he was under the express orders of the House to attend an important Committee here. Captain Stackpole has been elected for Ennis, in place of Sir J. D. Fitzgerald, the Irish Law Officer.

Of foreign news the only item of much interest is the fact that the Spaniards do not consider they have done enough in the way of castigating the Moors, so the Envoys are sent back by the Duke of Tetuan, and Spanish vessels are bombarding towns on the coast. The Court of Spain has not evinced any liberality in feeling against England, for being so brutal as to ask, and even accept, payment of a small portion of her debt from Spain. Long reckonings do not keep nations friendly any more than individuals. Perhaps it is as well to have a country ready, upon a hint, to ludicrously false and foolish attacks of the Spaniards, unless we "project our souls into the future," and say to them, as to petulant children, "We very next time a Napoleon overruns Spain, see whether we send a Wellington to turn him out."

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The anniversary dinner of the London Coffee and Eating Houses-keepers' Benevolent Association is fixed for Monday, April 30, when Lord Brougham will take the chair.

The second public dinner of the members and friends of the Railway Benevolent Institution will take place on the 14th inst at the London Tavern, in aid of the funds.

The authorities of the British Museum have exhibited certain mutilated books in the reading-room, with a note inviting attention to the circumstances of portions having been torn by some person. In one of these, "Rees's Dictionary of Arts," several leaves have been thus obstructed, and from an atlas a large map.

A deputation on the subject is providing a plot of ground in the east end of London for a mausoleum and library, to supply the educational wants of 650,000 inhabitants of the Tower Hamlets, had an interview with the Right Hon. Mr. Cowper on Wednesday, at the office of her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings, Whitehall-place.

A Free Trade meeting was held on Saturday evening, at a quarter before eleven o'clock, on the premises of Messrs. Keen, Rippon, and Morley, Warehousemen, of Wood-street, Cheapside. The meeting was called by circular, and spread with great rapidity. The amount of property destroyed was very large. The house and its contents were destroyed, and about a dozen other houses were damaged.——On Thursday morning a fire broke out at the residence of Mr. Hall, No. 11, Barnsbury-road, which resulted in death.

THE PAPER DUTY.—A meeting of the Newspaper Press Association was held on Wednesday—Mr. Ewart, M.P., in the chair. Mr. Francis, the secretary, having made a statement with reference to the progress and position of the Association, Mr. Lowe proposed a resolution expressing that the proposed opposition to the repeal of the paper duty involved the fullest consideration which could have been given to the Public and Sir H. Bulwer. A number of speeches were made in support of the resolution, which was unanimously carried.

THE ABERDEEN BANK.—Lord Campbell has just delivered judgment in the case of Mr. Hunter, manufacturer in Aberdeen, against chief of the Aberdeen Bank directors, are liable to an action by the regent institution of the bank, for damages sustained by the failure. The plea set tained by being induced, through the monstrous misrepresentations of Directors as to the prosperity of the bank, immediately to invest his money in it; the fact being that for all that time the bank was in a ruinous state, and Directors and the Auditor guilty of fraud. Damages were living upon the funds.

EXTRAORDINARY BANK OF TRUSTEE.—Mr. William Francis Vondervell, of Ballimore-street, Piccadilly, was brought before the magistrate at Worship-street, on the application of the official assignee, for shares and a railway bond, amounting in value to £7000. The prisoner has one of the largest banks of those and similar securities in the City. One of the trustees died, and another went to Australia, leaving him a power of attorney to act for both. Instead of selling the property as directed by the trustees, he pledged it with Mr. Borland that more than 100 shares in the London and Westminster Bank, which had been sold for £4000, should not twelve months back without her knowledge. The prisoner stands committed, bail being refused.

THE PALACE OF THE PEOPLE.—"The Great Northern Palace Company (limited)" have launched their plan for a great "Palace of the People" at Highgate, which combines so many of the most popular features, concert and lecture room and various in-door and out-door amusements. The means of access and egress obtainable at no very great expense. Lord Brougham has accepted the office of president of a council to be instituted with the object of securing to the Palace the character that this population of the north side of London is more than 1,500,000; that the building will be constructed of iron and glass, and will be open all the year time, without the fatigue of a long ascent; and that the estate, which consists of about 50 acres, is to be laid out in the style of a park or suburban residence of villas.

MILLINERS AND DRESSMAKERS' PROVIDENT AND BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The twelfth annual meeting of the friends and supporters of this society was held on Tuesday at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-st, St. James's—Mr. Stephen Lewis in the chair. The report stated that during the past year 1,000 cases had been admitted. The subscribers now consist of 194 members, of whom 53 were life and 51 annual subscribers. During the year ending the 31st of December, 1859, the sum of £1,000 5s. 5d. was, after paying all expenses, there remained a balance at the banker's of the 31st of January, 1860, of £1,000 5s. 5d. The Rev. Thomas Jones, M.A., the preacher and publisher of the Family Herald, had bequeathed £100 to the Institution. Lord Ingestre had also promised £100 would form part of the assets of the current year. The report was adopted.

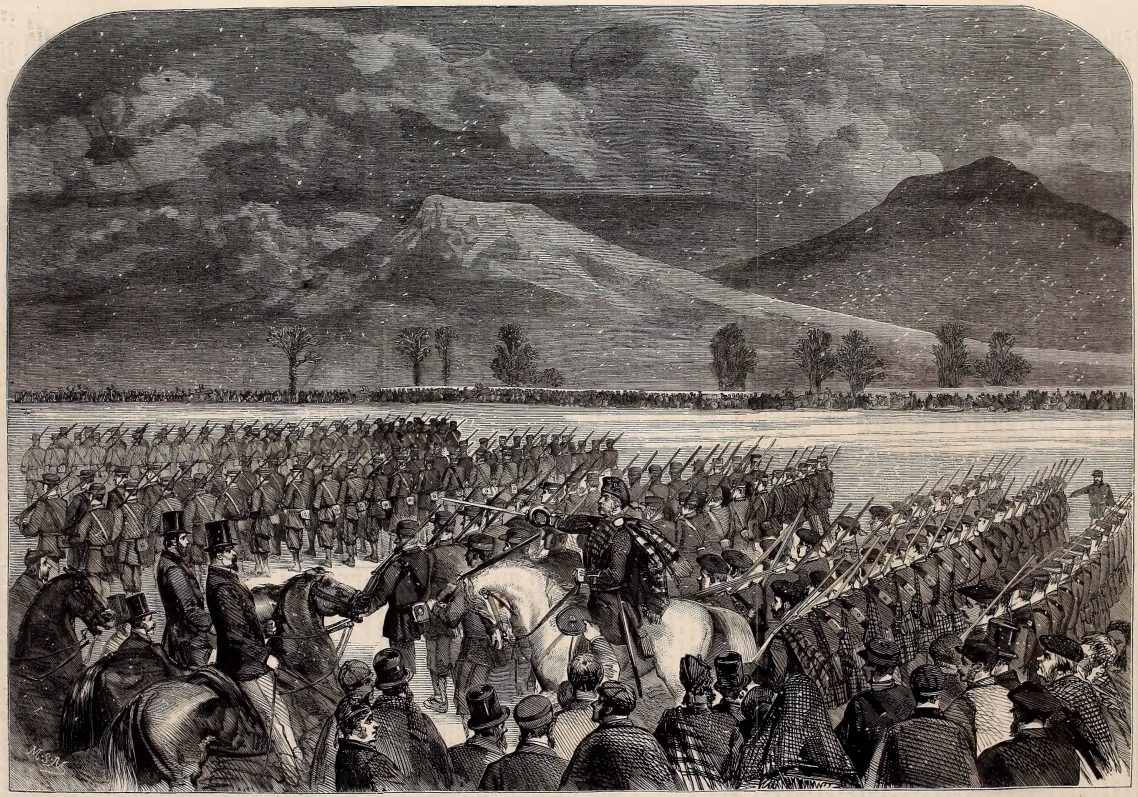
THE NEW WESTMINSTER BRIDGE.—For some weeks past one half of the east footway of Westminster-bridge, next the Surrey side, was closed from the Board of Works to be thrown open to the public. The first stone of the bridge was laid on the 3rd November, 1854, and the block of bosses on the Surrey side and four on the Middlesex side were required to be removed in order to form the footways. The bosses were then sawn down, and the road on each side is now completely formed. The Hon. Mr. Cowper, the Commissioner of Works, and the members of the Board of Works were in company with Mr. Page, who explained to him the mode of construction of the bridge, the facing of it with iron arches, and other matters of detail. The first half, now finished, will only be opened for the present for carriage traffic; foot passengers will continue to perform a portion of the journey by the remainder of the works connected with the new one are being carried on. A proposal has been made to the Board of Works to open a theatre in honour of the cut leading to the formation of an embankment, extending from the present bridge to the Lambeth side, and Waterloo-road. The cut is now opened on Thursday afternoon for foot passengers only.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN LONDON.—The number of 977 boys and 957 girls (in all 1934 children) were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks in the years 1850-59 the average number was 1668. The sickness which is now so generally diffused throughout the metropolis has produced a large number of deaths during the past quarter. The deaths registered in London, which rose in the previous week to 1454, increased in the week that ended on the 18th February to 1534—the ten deaths of 1850 persons were registered. In the ten years 1850-59 the average number of deaths in the corresponding week was 1104. Of the deaths returned last week occurred in an increased population, the average is about 40 per cent above the number proportionally returned in the ten years 1850-59. It appears, therefore, that the deaths of last week exceeded by 430 the number which would have occurred if the mortality had been equal to the average. Of the 1595 deaths, 784 occurred under 20 years of age, 138 in the period 20 to 40 years, 274 in the period 40 to 60 years, and 399 at 60 years and upwards. Of these, six were deaths of nonagenarians; and the widow of a butler residing in Hampton-court Backwards, had attained, it is said, the age of 101 years.

CABMEN'S CLUBS.—The cabmen's club, set on foot by the Earl of Shaftesbury, held their first annual meeting on Tuesday evening at the Stafford Rooms—the Earl of Shaftesbury, president of the society, in the chair. The noble chairman, in opening the proceedings, made a statement and enrolled themselves immediately on the formation of the society. The rooms comprise a dining-room, a smoking-room, a room for the exercise of religious and moral character, it was also supplied with papers and periodicals. The noble chairman stated that the object for which the society had been established. The chairman congratulated the members on the celebration of their first anniversary dinner, and on the success which laboured under many unjust imputations, such as general discourteousness and incivility, and also of being addicted to drunkenness. He was sure that many of them could testify to the fact that a great deal of this, when it did exist, existed to a great extent from the provoking treatment of which they were frequently the victims. The meeting was subsequently addressed by Lord Henry Cholmondeley, the Rev. Mr. Champneys, and Mr. Scott Russell. The proceedings were then been of a very interesting character throughout, terminated with a cordial vote of thanks to the chairman.

INSTITUTION OF NAVAL ARCHITECTS.—On Thursday morning a meeting of gentlemen connected with the Royal Navy, and the shipping interests engaged in building and fitting out iron vessels, was held for the purpose of assisting in the inauguration of an Institution of Naval Architects, the proceedings of which are to extend over three days. Admiral the Duke of Northumberland was elected president, and several vice-presidents were appointed, among whom were Mr. Fairbairn, C.E., Mr. Woolley, Principal of the College of Naval Architecture, read a paper "On the Proportions of Ships," and communicated by Mr. Fairbairn, and Mr. Scott Russell "On the Wave-line Theory;" and Mr. Grantham "On the Strength of Ships." Mr. Reed read a paper "On Iron Armour Plates." In the afternoon, at another meeting, held in the evening, the Earl of Hardwicke presided, when the following papers were read:—"On the Comparison between the Mode of Building Iron Ships and the Ultimate Correction of their Compasses," Mr. G. B. Airey, F.R.S., Astronomer Royal; and "On Chain Cables," by Mr. G. W. Lennox, F.G.S. On Friday, at the morning meeting, papers were read "On Experiments made upon Some of H.M. Ships for Ascertaining the Positions of their Centres of Gravity in a Vertical Sense," by Mr. F. K. Barnes; three short Papers "On the Tonnage Laws," by Mr. G. Moorsom, Surveyor-General of Tonnage, by the Rev. Joseph Woolley, and by Mr. S. Read. At the evening meeting, "On an Improvement in the Form of Ships," by Mr. Joseph Mandslay; "On a Method of Constructing Diagonal-built Ships," by Mr. J. Wride; and "On certain Improvements in Marine Engines," by Mr. Robert Murray. At the meeting on Saturday (to-day) the following papers are to be read:—"On Mechanical Inventions, in Relation to Improvements in Naval Architecture," by Mr. W. H. Barnaby; "On the Wave-line Theory," (Part II.), by Mr. J. Scott Russell.

SOCIETY FOR THE ENCOURAGEMENT OF THE FINE ARTS.—The first conversazione for the season of this society took place on Wednesday evening at their rooms, 9, Conduit-street, the gallery of the Architectural Photographic Association being kindly thrown open for the occasion. Mr. H. Ottley, who took the chair, briefly explained the intended arrangement of prizes, and the opening of classes of music and drawing. The announcement that the Earl of Ellesmere, one of the vice-presidents of the society, had most kindly intimated his intention of presenting a prize for the best pictorial picture-study at Burlington House for the conversazione, or meeting of the society, in May, was warmly received. Mr. J. Bell Pratt, Mr. David, R.A., then read a paper on "The Fine Arts—their Use, Decline, and Present Position," taking a popular and practical view of the subject, which was listened to with great attention, and applauded at the close. The proceedings of the evening were wound up with a musical performance conducted by Mr. Alfred Gilbert. Some choice pictures and works of sculpture decorated the west gallery. The conversazione was numerously attended.



MR. TIDD PRATT ON FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.—Yesterday week Mr. Tidd Pratt, Registrar of Friendly Societies in England, delivered a lecture at the Working Men's Institute and Library, York-road, Lambeth, the large hall of which was well filled on the occasion. Mr. Pratt commenced his address by taking a brief review of his own life, and then proceeded to explain the constitution of benefit societies, and the legislation applying thereto. The audience should be supported on a scale amounting to an annual surplus. A friendly society during the first ten years of its existence would not have much to distribute, but after that time it would be safe for sickness that it would have had the two years succeeding. Members should not be allowed to fall while behind with their dues. Before admittance should be made of the past year's membership. The delay till February would open a man, when in the full vigour of health, to a fraud, should always be discouraged. Meetings should be conducted in a business manner, and the accounts audited at public meetings. Foundation-stones were then laid by Mr. Pratt, and it is very much to be regretted that such very beneficial objects could be carried out. The meeting on Saturday and Monday next promises to be equally striking. The investment of the funds was a very important matter. By a recent Act there was a limitation to the modes of investment. Mr. Pratt proceeded to comment on the particular society whose members he was addressing. He thought it could not be expected that they would be able to subscribe under his notice. There were, he was happy to state, 21,700 benefit clubs in England, and the total number of bodies of members belong to them. He strongly advised that no man should become a member of any society in the rules of which were not fully explained to him. Gratuitous relief did not cost one halfpenny. A member of an uncertified society had no means of knowing whether he was receiving official relief. Mr. Pratt concluded his remarks on the frugal habits of the working classes. Questions were put by working men in the body of the hall, and a discussion arose, which enabled Mr. Tidd Pratt to offer explanations in detail.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.—On Sunday the services at this place of worship assumed a new character, the present week being the season of Lent, a considerable alteration had been made in the altar. The drapery, which was of white and red silk, with a large cross in the centre. This cross was changed, so far as the colour was concerned, on different evenings: at one time it was white, at another time red. It is said, however, that the proceedings had given offence to some parties in the parish, and that legal proceedings, in consequence, had written to Bishop. The result of that application was the following letter, received by Mr. Thompson, the churchwarden, from the bishop's secretary:—"I am directed to say, "I have received a letter informing me of certain changes in the arrangement of the altar and reredos in your church. I have to inform you that any arrangement of our parish churches excite the parishioners, I require you, before the service of to-morrow, to cause the altar to be restored by the clergyman in charge, and, if it appears to you that ornaments thus exhibited are such as are forbidden by the article nearly relating thereto, to remove them." At ten o'clock on Sunday morning Mr. Thompson, accompanied by the Rev. Dove, the clergyman in charge of the district, and the churchwarden, removed the objectionable formula from the altar, and the consequence was that the morning service went on without a whisper, as it has been ever since. The result of the whole controversy is thus stated:—"The Guardian says, 'The objectionable paper is now to be further removed, and there appears to have been the middle course of the Bishop's decision for Lent; the same as is done in the Royal Chapels, in St. Paul's Cathedral, and in many churches of the London Diocese.' At the meeting of the person named Prout was taken into custody on the charge of "saying the responses irreverently and with a loud voice," and subsequently of "lecturer's" service, a disquieted woman made her way into the church, and commenced a loud and violent harangue against the Rev. Dove. She was fined 10s. by the Thames police magistrate for being "drunk and disorderly." The case caused a great excitement, and there was much disturbance at the evening service, more than 200 policemen being present. At page 217 we have engraved a View of the Interior of St. George's Church

ROYAL NATIONAL LIFE-BOAT INSTITUTION.—A meeting of this institution was held on Wednesday at the London Tavern—John Abel Smith, Thomas Baring, Esq., M.P., in the chair. The second service clap was moved by Captain Washington, R.N., and was seconded by Captain Ommanney, R.N., the secretary to the society; also the medal to Captain Thomas Davies, R.N., and to George Pilkington, as coxswain of the Southport and Lytham volunteer life-saving life-boats stationed at Fleetwood, Great Yarmouth, and in rescuing the crews, consisting of nine men, from the Danish barque Hermania, and the brig the John Bull, of Yarmouth. The crews of the two boats were paid £38 for the service. Rewards amounting to £40 were likewise voted to the crews of the society's life-boat stations at Kirkcudbright, Wick, and Fraserburgh for putting off recently with the view of rendering assistance to ships in distress, but which were not required to render aid. The silver medal of the institution was also voted to Thomas Baker, coastguardsman; the thanks of the meeting were voted to Mr. Abel Smith, on the chair, in addition to money rewards which they had locally received for their services in the chair on occasions of the launch of the new life-boat at Southport, which was recently wrecked at the entrance of the Isle of Wight. Rewards were also voted to the crews of the life-boats stationed at Aldeburgh, Suffolk, and Cullercoats, Northumberland; at Port Isaac and Cawsand, Cornwall, and at Lytham, in Dundrum Bay. A benevolent lady in Manchester had presented to the society the sum of £100, to be applied in such manner as it should be thought fit, on the north-east coast of Scotland, and at Kingsdown, near Deal, the two stations of which she had also been personally presented to the society. It was reported that the institution had now under its charge ninety-nine life-boats stationed on the coasts of the United Kingdom, and that the management of a philanthropic institution. Some of these boats had been instrumental in saving by their means the lives of eighteen of our fellow-creatures from a watery grave. The Royal Mersey Yacht Club presented to the society the handsome donation of £100 being the proceeds of a ball given by the club at Liverpool in aid of the funds of the Life-boat Institution. The Lord Adelstad Yacht Club of Southampton they had been invited to take the chair at the annual meeting of the institution, at the London Tavern on Thursday, the 15th inst., when the amounting to £627 having been made on various life-boat establishments, the proceedings closed

RAILWAY DIVIDENDS.—Several of the railway companies have paid their half yearly meetings during the week. On Thursday the shareholders of the South-Eastern Railway met, and a dividend of 4s on each £25 stock was agreed to. The Great Northern Company have declared a dividend at the rate of 6 per cent per annum. A dividend at the rate of 5 per cent per annum was agreed to at the meeting of the Hartlepool and Lancaster Company. On Monday the half yearly meeting of the proprietors of the Boston and Eastern Junction Railway was held—Mr. Ingham, M.P., in the chair. The revenue exhibited a progressive and satisfactory increase, and a dividend was declared of 3s per share for the half year ended the 31st of December last, the first half year of working the line throughout. Mr. Mackinnon said that he was glad to report a satisfactory one for a first year's traffic, and he considered the construction of the line was a most successful one. A dividend was declared on the Nottingham, Nottingham, and Boston Company, at their meeting on Tuesday, declared a dividend of 6s. 6d. per share, and at the meeting of the North and South Western Junction Railway held their meeting, and a dividend of 2½ per cent was declared. At the meeting on Tuesday of the proprietors of the Norfolk Railway Company, on Tuesday, a dividend was declared of £1.10s. 5d. per share, and a bonus of 10s. per share, consolidated. At the meeting of the Taff Vale Railway it has been decided to pay a dividend for the year of 8 per cent; the Northern Counties Union, 7s. per share; the Eastern Counties, 2s. 6d. per share; and a half-yearly dividend at the meeting of the shareholders in the General Steam Navigation Company was held on Tuesday, when the customary dividend of 1½ per share, being at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, and the usual bonus of 2s. 6d. per share, was declared.——The directors of the London and United Service Bank have declared a dividend at the rate of 10 per cent for the second half of 1859, and a bonus at the same rate, making for the previous dividend, a return of 12 per cent to the shareholders for the past year.——At a meeting of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, on Wednesday, it was resolved to raise £20,000, in £20 shares, to eliminate the recovery of the old cable, and its restoration to working order. The subscribers to this issue will, in case of success, receive a bonus of another £20 share for every paid up, and in the other event have a lien on the proceeds of all the cable that may be saved.

At the Manchester Police Court, on Tuesday, a young man received a sentence of three months' imprisonment for cutting the leaves out of a Blackwood's Magazine in the Campfield Free Library. The name of the man is Isaac Ellis. The offence is capable of two construc ions—it may be punished as a misdemeanour or as a larceny; and, as the committee requested it might be dealt with summarily, the magistrate awarded the s months' imprisonment for it.

GENERAL ZABALA.

GENERAL ZABALA, who lately commanded the second corps of the Spanish expeditionary army to Africa, is an officer held next in consideration to O'Donnell. On many occasions during the civil wars in Spain he greatly distinguished himself, and he was one of the first Generals selected for the Moorish campaign. Unfortunately he was taken seriously ill after the action fought on the 1st of January (in which he took a brilliant part), and was obliged to go into Ceuta on the sick list. Anxious to return to his command and share in the glory of the capture of Tetuan, he left his bed while still in a weak condition, which proceeding materially aggravated his malady and necessitated his return to Spain. General Prim succeeds to the command of the second corps. Our Portrait of General Zabala is from a photograph taken at the camp.

GENERAL ZABALA, LATELY COMMANDING THE SECOND CORPS OF THE SPANISH ARMY IN MOROCCO.

THE EMPIRE OF MOROCCO.

WE have given from time to time some particulars of this country, towards which the public attention is now naturally directed, and annexed are some further details, chiefly from "Johnston's Gazetteer," to accompany our Map:—

Morocco, or Marocco (Arab. Moghrib-ul-Aksa, "the Extreme West"), the ancient Mauritania, is a country of North-west Africa, between lat. 28° and 36° N., long. 0° 46' and 11° 40' W., having E. and S.E. the Desert, N.E. Algeria, W. the Atlantic, and N. the Mediterranean Sea. Its area is over 200,000 square miles. The population is variously estimated, some authorities giving it as high as 14,000,000, while others fix it at 8,000,000, of whom about 3,550,000 are Moors, 3,750,000 Berbers and Shellooks, 740,000 Bedouins, and 339,500 Jews. The surface of the country is mountainous, covered with ramifications of Mount Atlas, but comprising many fine plains and valleys. The principal rivers are the Mahala, flowing into the Mediterranean; the Sebu, Morbeya, Tensift, and Sura, entering the Atlantic; and the Draha, beyond the Atlas. Its climate is for the most part healthy, the temperature seldom exceeding 85° Fahr. The soil in the valleys was celebrated in antiquity for its great fertility, and yielding, in some places, three crops of corn in one year; but so little is agriculture understood that large crops of corn are sometimes suffered to remain unreaped, and at other times many of the inhabitants die of famine. The principal crops are wheat, maize, millet, and barley; dates, grapes, olives, sugar-cane, cotton, tobacco, the fruits of South Europe, cork, and henna. Timber for building is not generally abundant, and is imported from Spain. The grass lands are rich, and feed a fine race of horses, the exportation of which is prohibited; besides large numbers of sheep, goats, oxen, and mules. Camels and asses are the principal beasts of burden. The mineral products comprise iron, copper, and antimony. The domestic manufactures comprise woollen and cotton fabrics. Leather is made in large quantities in most of the towns; red caps, silk fabrics, good saddlery, carpets, chip baskets, and earthenwares, are among the chief articles manufactured. A trade with the Levant is carried on by the Mecca and other caravans, and by feluccas coasting along the shores of Barbary. There is also a communication by caravans with Timbuctoo and other places in Central Africa, where the Morocco traders exchange salt, dates, tobacco, cloth, caps, girdles, and daggers, for gold-dust, ivory, rhinoceros' horns, ostrich feathers, and slaves. The exports to Europe consist of wax, hides, skins, olive oil, gums, wool, dates, honey, indigo, shawls, carpets, &c. The Government is more despotic than in most Mohammedan States. The empire consists of the kingdoms of Morocco, Fez, and the territories Sus, Draha, and Tafilet; and is subdivided into twenty-eight provinces. Among its principal cities and towns are Morocco, Fez, Mequinez, Rabat, Salley, Tarudant, Tituan, Tesa, Mogodore, and Tangier, which, with other capitals of provinces, are governed by military prefects. The towns are chiefly inhabited by Moors and Jews, which latter conduct the larger mercantile transactions; the Berbers and Shellooks form the bulk of the agricultural population; and the Arabs generally lead a wandering life on the plains, living in tents, and subsisting on the produce of their herds and flocks. Arts and sciences are at a low ebb, though in most of the cities and towns are Mohammedan colleges, the principal of which is at Fez. The standing army amounts, in time of peace, to 15,000 or 20,000; in war, to 80,000 or 100,000; mostly negro slaves. The navy, once formidable, is now insignificant.

"PLAYFULNESS." A STATUETTE.

BY G. HALSE.

MR. HALSE is a young artist, but upon more than one occasion has exhibited works which display considerable fancy in the creation, good taste in their treatment, and careful and successful execution. His statuette of "Playfulness," exhibited this season at the British Institution, is entitled to praise on all these grounds. The idea is that of a young girl playing with a favourite dove, which has perched itself on her head, and seeking to entice it back to her finger. The figure, which is youthful, is elegant in form and proportion, and the attitude is at once easy and graceful. The slight drapery in which it is invested is loosely cast, and so treated as to show the outline of the form beneath it. Upon the whole we may congratulate the artist upon the production of a work which is at once pleasing to the general eye, and satisfactory in an artistic sense.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

DUTIES ON BRITISH SPIRITS.—The standing orders were suspended to enable the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in Committee of Ways and Means, to propose a resolution to the effect that, in addition to the duty now payable on spirits distilled in the United Kingdom, there should be charged on every gallon of such spirits at proof, which, on or after the 29th of February, should be distilled or be in the stock of any distiller, or in any duty-free warehouse, or removing to such warehouse, the additional duty of one penny. The resolution was agreed to.

MASTERS AND OPERATIVES BILL.—Mr. MACKINNON moved the second reading of this bill, the object of which, he said, was to establish a tribunal for the amicable settlement of disputes between masters and workmen.—Sir G. C. LEWIS opposed the bill, on the ground that its machinery was so imperfect that, if passed into law, it could not realise the expectations of the promoters.—After some discussion, Sir S. M PETO suggested that the second reading should be postponed, and the bill referred to a Select Committee.—Mr. MACKINNON accepted the suggestion, and the second reading was postponed for a month, on the understanding that at the expiration of that period the bill would be referred to a Select Committee.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD AND DRINK.—The House then went into Committee on the Adulteration of Food and Drink Bill. The consideration of the first clause occupied some hours, and a number of verbal amendments having been agreed to, the Committee ultimately divided on the question that the clause as amended stand part of the bill, which was affirmed by 116 to 25. Clause 2 was postponed. On clause 3 an amendment was moved by Mr. E. JAMES, which was negatived.—On the question that the clause stand part of the bill, a division was taken, and, the numbers being—For the clause, 58; against it, 34; the clause was agreed to, and the House resumed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

THE REFORM BILL.

Lord John RUSSELL rose at five minutes to five for the purpose of asking leave to bring in a bill further to amend the law relating to the representation of the people in Parliament. At this time there were in the galleries the Earl of Derby, Lord Lyvedon, Lord Belper, Earl Stanhope, the Bishop of Carlisle, Viscount Everaley, and other peers.

The noble Lord, having presented a petition from 10,000 (as we understood) inhabitants of the city of London in favour of Reform, proceeded to say that he had no desire in any bill he might propose to alter the landmarks of the Constitution of this country. When he compared the present state of the country with that before the Reform Act of 1832 he could not but congratulate the country upon the fact that since that time the people generally were more satisfied with the institutions under which they lived. In 1820 Lord Castlereagh introduced a measure restraining the liberties of the people, and to prevent the expression of public opinion out of doors; but in 1860 there was a universal desire to maintain the institutions of the country. What he now proposed to do was to supply some omissions in the late Reform Act which were of considerable importance.

There was one point upon which the opinion of the country had been expressed, which was the mode of voting in counties. He proposed to add to the counties an occupation-franchise of £10 a year, and means would be taken to secure that it should be a bonâ fide occupation, and that there should be a building of not less than £5, except in case of dwelling-houses. He then came to the lowering of the borough franchise. Some time after the passing of the last Reform Bill he felt that the £10 qualification was too high, and that it was injurious to our Parliamentary representation. It had been said that the franchise had been especially framed to exclude the working classes. He did not admit that; but it was framed to admit the middle classes, whose intelligence and wealth were entitled to the franchise. It would be unjust any longer to exclude the working classes, who, by their intelligence and character, were entitled to the franchise; and he believed that by according to them the privilege they would become more attached to the institutions of the country. It had been said that there had been no agitation on the subject, and that they should wait until there was an imperative demand for legislation; but that was not the political wisdom which he had been taught, for he was of opinion that legislation on such points should, as much as possible, be proceeded with in a state of quietness, and that they ought not to wait until the working classes combined to press their demands upon the consideration of Parliament. He had no wish to wait until Nottingham and Bristol came forward to tell Parliament that there should be no further delay.

In considering this subject he had thought that it was better to make the measure as simple as possible, and to avoid introducing franchises hitherto unknown to the Constitution of the country, which had been termed "fancy franchises." He proposed to extend further the £10 franchise—to maintain the payment of rates, but to lower the franchise from that at which it at present stood. With that view he had made many inquiries, and very carefully considered their results. Attention had been called to the question whether there should be a rateable franchise. If that plan were adopted there would be differences which would be dependent upon local authorities, so that one person would have a vote, while another would not have one, who paid upon exactly the same amount of property. Next came the question whether they should take the gross annual rental or the net annual value. It was found that many persons were prevented from having votes, as, in many cases, the difference was as much as 27½ per cent.

Then came the question, how many electors would be added to the boroughs by adopting any particular sum as the purchase? The present number of voters on the register was 440,770, but of these many were qualified under the old scot and lot, and therefore they deducted 33,765, leaving 410,000 on the registry. They found that a £9 franchise would give 440,717; an £8 franchise would give 476,004; a £7 franchise would give 532,817; a £6 franchise would give 604,200, which would give an additional number of 194,000, making, with those which at present existed a total number of 634,969, which he did not think at all an extravagant number.

Then comes the question, what was the character of the persons who would be added to the registry? He believed, from inquiries he had made, that the characters of the persons would add weight to the character of the representation. He came now to another question, of a different nature, and one which it behoved the House to consider well as to the changes now or hereafter to be made. When, twenty-nine years ago, he brought in a bill, the task was comparatively easy, for public sense condemned places which sent members which had few inhabitants, while such towns as Manchester, Leeds, and Birmingham were unrepresented.

The noble Lord adverted to the disputes which had many years since prevailed as to whether Ministers of the Crown should be able to hold seats in the House of Commons in virtue of their office, or whether they should be able to hold seats at all, leaving the House an entirely independent body. In more recent times it had been admitted that persons of ability conducting the affairs of the country should have seats in that House, and lately it had been the practice of counties and boroughs to return them. He held that it was quite necessary, as a matter of accommodation, that they should have some small boroughs, inasmuch as many persons of great ability would never risk an appearance before very large constituencies. If they were to have the government of the country carried on in that House by Ministers of the Crown it was necessary to have other constituencies than counties and large boroughs.

The right honourable gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) in his bill made the least changes that had been proposed in connection with Reform; while the proposition of the hon. member for Birmingham certainly made the greatest. In laying down a general principle, he was far from saying which would be the best system, that of the right hon. gentleman or the right hon. member for Birmingham. He thought that in dealing with this matter they should give some consideration to the state of that House. He remembered (when the late Reform Bill was under consideration), when it was proposed to disfranchise Ludgershall, the member for that place got up and, and, much to his honour, said, "I am the patron of Ludgershall, I am the elector of Ludgershall, and I am the member for the Ludgershall, and in all three capacities I vote for the disfranchisement of Ludgershall." But the state of the House of Commons was now very different, and they could not now deal with it in a similar manner.

He proposed that ten boroughs, whose names he would read, should no longer send two members to Parliament. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) in his bill proposed to take one member from each of the following boroughs which returned two members:—Honiton, Thetford, Totnes, Harwich, Evesham, Wells, Richmond, Maldon, Marlborough, Lymington, Leominster, Ludlow, Andover, Knaresborough, and Tewkesbury. To this number he (the noble Lord) proposed to add the following: Ripon, Cirencester, Huntingdon, Chippenham, Bodmin, Dorchester, Devizes, Hertford, Guildford, and Marlow. This would give twenty-five seats. He proposed to give to the West Riding two additional seats, to the southern division of Lancashire two, and to each of the following one:—North Lancashire, Middlesex, West Kent, South Devon, South Stafford, North Riding, the part of Lindsay, South Essex, East Somerset, West Norfolk, West Cornwall, and North Essex. He proposed that Kensington and Chelsea should form a borough with two members; that Birkenhead, Staleybridge, and Burnley should have each one member; and that Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, and Leeds should (each) return three members.

In case of places where there were three members he proposed that the third member should represent the minority.

In the next place he would consider the claims of the University of London, to which he proposed to give the franchise. Although he failed on two previous occasions, he did not see that he should fail on this.

The noble Lord sat down at five minutes to six.

Mr. DISRAELI asked when the second reading would take place?

Lord J. RUSSELL: Not less than a fortnight.

Mr. BRIGHT said the noble Lord had read the list of boroughs so fast that it was impossible to get any accurate account on them. He should like to know whether the noble Lord included the four vacants seats for Sudbury and St. Alban's.

Lord J. RUSSELL said it was proposed to give them to Ireland and Scotland.

Mr. WALPOLE regretted that the noble Lord had not thought right to maintain the present distinction between counties and boroughs.

Mr. AYRTON rose and was understood to say that the Tower Hamlets constituency, so enormous in amount, was not considered in the bill.

In reply to Mr. Bright, Lord J. RUSSELL stated that the vacant seats of St. Albans and Sudbury would be given to Scotland and Ireland.

Mr. WALPOLE wished to know whether the payment of poor rates would be required to be made by the tenant, or could be made by any other person in his behalf? With regard to the details of the bill, all he would say at present was that, the more attention he was enabled to give the subject, the more he was convinced that the old distinction between counties and boroughs ought to be maintained and even extended.

Major EDWARDS asked whether in the event of the bill becoming law it would necessitate an immediate dissolution?

Mr. WILLIAMS complained of the provisions of the bill on the ground of the little addition they made to the number of metropolitan members.

Mr. NEWDEGATE asked what was the increase the bill would create in the number of county voters?

Sir G. GREY said it was impossible to state the exact increase, on account of the incompleteness of the returns.

Lord J. RUSSELL, in reply to the various questions which had been put to him, said the bill did not propose any alteration with regard to the poor rate, but the tenant would be obliged to pay the rate as at present. He did not think he would be justified in stating what the increase in the number of county voters would be in case the bill passed; but it appeared from a return that the number of persons in England and Wales rated between £10 and £50 was 415,000. He did not think, however, that that return afforded a really satisfactory test. With regard to a dissolution in the event of the bill becoming law, he might state that the new claims would be made at the November registration, and, of course, when that registration was complete it would be competent for her Majesty to dissolve Parliament.

Mr. ROEBUCK complained of an additional representative being given to Leeds, while no addition was made to Sheffield, which had a larger constituency.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

NEW REFORM BILL FOR IRELAND.

Mr. CARDWELL then moved for leave to bring in a bill further to amend the laws relating to the representation of the people in Ireland. It was proposed to change the provisions of the Act of 1850, which regulated the qualification in counties at £12, and to substitute £10; and in boroughs to reduce the £10 franchise to £8. The number of electors in the various counties in Ireland was 174,000, which would be increased by the proposition now made by 30,000—making the total 204,000. The increase to the borough franchise by the proposed reduction of rating would be 6655 voters, which, when added to the existing borough and county electors, would increase the whole elective body to 240,000. It was also proposed to give an additional member to the county of Cork, and another to the city of Dublin, the seats allotted to be taken from the four suspended seats in England. The Government did not think it desirable at present to give any member to the Queen's University, as that institution was not sufficiently prepared for the distinction; but it was proposed to remove the disqualification which now prevented Irish Peers from representing counties or boroughs in Ireland. He hoped that this measure would give satisfaction to the people of Ireland.

Mr. WHITESIDE denounced the measure as totally uncalled for, unnecessary, and unsatisfactory in its provisions.

Mr. MAGUIRE contended that the proposition which would enable Irish Peers to represent Irish boroughs and counties was an infringement of the Act of Union, was revolutionary, and would be wholly repugnant to the feelings of the Irish people.

Sir G. C. LEWIS quoted a passage from the Act of Union to show that the proposal to allow Irish Peers to represent Irish constituencies was not contrary to the spirit of the Constitution.

Sir J. SHELLEY took exception to the provision which made the payment of poor rates the condition of representation.

Mr. CARDWELL contrasted the population and wealth of Dublin and Birmingham, and said that it would have been impossible to have given the latter an additional member without entertaining the claims of the former.

Colonel DICKSON protested against the proposition with regard to Irish Peers, and predicted that it would be opposed by the Irish members of all shades of opinion.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

REFORM BILL FOR SCOTLAND.

The LORD ADVOCATE next moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the laws relating to the representation of the people in Scotland. The bill proposed to lower the county franchise to £10, and the borough franchise to £5, and to give additional members to Glasgow and the Scottish universities. The general features of the bill were otherwise identical with those of the measure for England. It was proposed, however, that the valuation roll should be the regular one, and that the registration courts should be done away with, the whole business of registration being transacted in the assessors' courts, which would sit in the month of October in each year. A £10 franchise had hithero been the property franchise. The Government had been requested to substitute the English 40s. freehold plan, but after careful consideration they thought such a scheme would not work satisfactorily in Scotland, and they therefore simply proposed to reduce the property franchise from £10 to £5.

Sir J. PAKINGTON said he was apprehensive that the proposed change in the system of registration in Scotland would prevent that uniformity between the bills for the three countries which was most desirable.

Mr. BAXTER thought the increase in the representation of Scotland much too limited, and intimated that when the English bill went into Committee he should move the disfranchisement of three or four English boroughs, in order that justice might be done to Scotland.

Sir J. FERGUSSON believed the bill to be both just and moderate, and thought it was fairly entitled to the consideration of the House.

Mr. STIRLING expressed his regret that two seats had not been awarded to the four universities instead of only one.

After some further discussion leave was given to bring in the bill.

The Reform Bill for England and Wales was brought in and read a first time. It was ordered to be read a second time on the 19th inst.

CUSTOMS ACTS.—THE BUDGET.

The House then went into Committee upon the Customs Acts, when the discussion upon resolution 4 was resumed.

The proposition for the admission of artificial flowers was agreed to.

On the proposition for admitting silks duty free,

Sir J. PAXTON moved the following amendment:—"That it is inexpedient to reduce the duties on silk being the manufacture of, and imported directly from, any country which does not permit the free importation of the silk manufactures of the United Kingdom."

Mr. NEWDEGATE opposed the free admission of silk altogether.

Mr. BRIGHT defended the proposition of the Government.

Mr. AYRTON attacked the leaders of the Manchester party for having become parties to a hasty and a heartless treaty, as far as it concerned the hardworking and industrious classes of this country.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER ridiculed the hon. member for the Tower Hamlets for attempting to revive the old days of protection.

Mr. E. BALL moved that the Chairman report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Upon a division the motion of Mr. Ball was negatived by a majority of 283 against 28.

After some further attempts to postpone the discussion, the proposition in regard to silk was agreed to upon the understanding that the discussion should be resumed on the following night upon the bringing up of the report.

[The accompanying report of the proceedings in both Houses of Parliament yesterday se'ennight appeared in our town edition last week.]

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY, FEB. 24.

SUNDAY EVENING SERVICES IN THEATRES.—Viscount DUNGANNON, according to notice, called the attention of the House to the performance of Divine service at Sadler's Wells and other theatres by clergymen of the Church of England on Sunday evenings, and moved a resolution that such services, being highly irregular and inconsistent with order, were calculated to injure rather than to advance the progress of sound religious principles in the metropolis and throughout the country.—The Archbishop of CANTERBURY dissented from the motion.—The Earl of SHAFTESBURY objected altogether to the views expressed by the noble Viscount, believing that a great amount of public good was being obtained from those religious services. After a long discussion the motion was withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY, FEB. 24.

THE PAPER DUTY.—Sir W. MILES moved for a return of the quantities of paper charged with duty, and the amount of duty received, from the year 1834 annually, up to the end of 1859; similar return of the quantities exported annually during the like period; similar return of the quantities of foreign paper imported annually into the United Kingdom during the like period, and also during the month of January, 1860, and of the quantities retained for home consumption; and return of the quantity of paper of all sorts charged with duties of excise in the United Kingdom, from 1834 to 1859, inclusive, and quantity thereof exported on drawback and retained for home consumption.—The motion was agreed to.

THE DUKE OF TETUAN.—Mr. WYLD asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if her Majesty's Government had received any information of the decree of her Most Catholic Majesty the Queen of Spain by which the title of Duke of Tetuan had been conferred upon Marshal O'Donnell, together with the territory of Morocco upon which the victory of Tetuan was gained?—Lord J. RUSSELL said that her Majesty's Government had received a communication on the subject, and he believed that the title had been proposed.

THE VOLUNTEERS.—Mr. E. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for War whether her Majesty's Government intended to order any battalions or regiments of the volunteer rifle corps now formed and in course of formation, during the ensuing summer, to the camp at Aldershot, or any other encampment, in the same manner and for the same purposes as regiments of the line and militia regiments had been encamped?—Mr. S. HERBERT answered in the negative.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY.—Sir H. WILLOUGHBY inquired what course Government intended to take in order to procure the assent of Parliament to the French treaty?—Lord PALMERSTON said it was intended, after the different articles of the treaty had been discussed in detail, to submit the whole question to the House on a motion for an address to the Crown.

THE FIGHT BETWEEN SAYERS AND HEENAN.—Mr. HADFIED called attention to this subject, and asked whether the Government intended to take measures to put down the intended disturbance of the public peace?—Sir G. C. LEWIS said he had entered into communication with Sir R. Mayne, and he had no doubt that every effort would be made to prevent the fight coming off within the metropolitan districts (Laughter). Beyond that he could give no assurance, as neither the day nor the place for the fight was yet fixed, and unless the police were enlightened upon these points they might have some difficulty in preventing a sudden incursion into some distant parts of the country (Laughter).

ADJOURNED DEBATE OF THE BUDGET.—DEFEAT OF MR. DU CANE'S AMENDMENT.

Mr. NEWDEGATE opened the adjourned debate by condemning the treaty, which, he said, not only gave undue concessions to France, but laid us open to have similar concessions demanded by all the world.

Mr. B. OSBORNE ridiculed the Protectionist objections of Mr. Newdegate, which were always put forward when free trade came under discussion. With respect to the treaty, he thought the more it was examined the more it would be found worthy of the support of the people of both countries. This treaty, unlike former ones, removed restrictions on commerce. He denied that any bargain had been made with France in the matter. It was a measure which gave the French Government essential assistance on their entrance upon the path of free trade. If the treaty were carried, he felt assured it would be the means of enabling us to cut down the enormous expenditure of our Army and Navy.

Mr. H. BARING had no objection to treaties, especially of a reciprocal character, and he thought that treaties ought to be between nations, and not between Governments.

Mr M. GIBSON was not surprised that Protectionists should oppose the Budget and the Treaty; but he was astonished that the leader of the Opposition, who avowed himself a Free-trader, should likewise oppose them. With respect to the treaty, he would remind the House that in 1852 Lord Derby proposed a commercial treaty with France, and in that treaty no reference was made to the Navigation Laws, although that point formed a strong ground of opposition to the present treaty. He contended that the treaty, although it might not be entirely perfect, would confer great commercial and political advantages both on England and France. The commercial treaty would set free industry, and he contended that no classes had a greater interest with extension and freedom of trade than the owners of land and houses. These classes ought, therefore, to give all the support in their power to any Government which extended, and which at the same time liberated, commerce. With respect to the income tax, he said that, considering it was necessary to raise £70,000,000 for the expenditure of the country, tenpence in the pound was not a very heavy contribution. He should deeply regret the rejection of the treaty on the insufficient ground of the income-tax. He felt the greatest obligation to Mr. Cobden for his attempt to liberate commerce in France, and he could not let the present debate close without giving utterance to his feelings (Cheers).

Mr. WALPOLE said the whole debate was made up of so many important questions that it would be advisable to narrow the discussion to the consideration of the fiscal policy best suited to meet present emergencies. A question of great national policy had been improperly mixed up by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with the question of internal finance. The hon. member for Essex (Mr. Du Cane) deserved the thanks of the House for bringing this view of the question broadly before Parliament. The motion of his hon. friend had been misrepresented by Mr. Bright and by the Secretary for Ireland. His opinion of the Budget was that it was right in principle, but he considered that exception might be taken as to the time and mode in which the provisions were to be carried out. He denied that the present motion would defeat the French treaty. If he thought it would he would not vote for the motion of his hon. friend. He should support the treaty, though he considered that it had been too hastily completed, because he could not see why jealous feelings should prevent two great nations from exchanging the products of industry in which both excelled. He could not conceive that Englishmen should be opposed to the attempt at breaking down barriers opposed to commercial freedom merely because one nation could not get as much as it wished from the other. He did not approve of the remission of £1,000,000 of paper duty under the circumstances with which it was proposed.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER replied to the principal arguments urged against the financial scheme, and, in a brilliant speech, vindicated the policy of the treaty with France, which he considered would do more to unite both countries together in the bonds of amity than any measure that could be adopted. He also predicted a future of great prosperity to both countries in the stimulus which would be given to their trading operations when the treaty would take effect. As to the main features of the Budget, he would not enter into a discussion upon them at that late hour (after midnight), reserving his remarks upon them until the resolutions came before the House, when they would be considered seriatim.

Mr. DISRAELI followed, defending the principles involved in the motion of the hon. member for Essex, and charging the Chancellor of the Exchequer with inconsistency in relation to the income tax and some of his other measures of finance.

Lord PALMERSTON wound up the debate by warning the Opposition of the serious responsibility they incurred in voting for a resolution which, in effect, was a rejection of the treaty with France, and a fatal blow to the whole financial scheme of her Majesty's Government.

The House then divided, when the numbers were:—

For Mr. Du Cane's amendment	223
Against it	339
Majority in favour of the Government ..	116

The announcement of the numbers was received with great cheering.

HONG-KONG.—Letters patent have been passed under the great seal of the United Kingdom for investing the Supreme Court of Hong-Kong with appellate jurisdiction in cases of civil suits between British subjects heard and determined under the authority of her Majesty's order in Council of the 3rd of March, 1859, by British Consuls within the dominions of the Emperor of Japan.

The visitors at the South Kensington Museum last week numbered 11,660. On Monday, Tuesday, and Saturday (free days) there were 5358; on Monday and Tuesday (free evenings), 4441; on the three students' days (admission to the public 6d.), 1412; students' evening (Wednesday), 440.

Yesterday week the Rev. William Canning, brother of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and one of the Canons of Windsor, accompanied his two nieces, the Hon. Misses Canning, in a walk below the slopes in the garden belonging to the Dean and Canons, when suddenly he fell into the arms of one of the young ladies, and expired almost instantaneously.

A RIDE TO AMOY.—After a hurried sketch of part of the Lam-poo-to Temple, we mount again and steer for the Telegraph Hill and the White Stag Temple, in search of views. Away we go across the country, up the stone roads, down the stone steps—rough riding that would astonish a foxhunter: never fear, the ponies are used to it; never mind the holes, the ponies see them; as for the steps, if they do not take them in their stride, they scramble up at a hand-galop; who cares though the stones are slippery, the ponies are not shod. Away we dash through the crowds, past the orange-stalls, our stirrups nearly scattering the fruit among the host of expecting boys; round the sharp narrow corners of the streets, the people squeezing themselves flat against the wall as the harum-scarum cavalcade fly past. There is no time to wait, however, and the people enjoy the fun if we may judge by their laughing faces as we pass them. No cry of "foreign devil" here; the foreigners are evidently feared, perhaps respected. We ride on through a part of the country covered with tombs—in this part of the world strange-looking objects, differing from any other graves that I have seen in China. The coffin is placed in the ground, covered over with earth, and then the earth is covered by a coating of lime—plastered in fact, so that at a distance the country has exactly the appearance of a large washing-green, or a links in Scotland; the graves look just like whins with clothes to dry hung upon them. The Temple of the White Stag (the name is derived from a small stone figure of such an animal in a cave hard by) is approached by a high flight of stone steps. No; I won't ride up these; a fall would be no joke; but the ponies seem to think nothing of it, and run up the stairs like lamplighters.—Twelve Years in China.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

MARCH does not bring much literature with it. Authors of established fame seem to be seeking for places under Government, or for seats in the Parliament as it will be, twice reformed, by Lord John Russell, should Finality John succeed with his second Reform Bill. It is not often given to a man after the lapse of some thirty years to yield a second benefit to his country; but this second benefit Lord John Russell is bound to give us, and will give us with no grudging hand. Conceive, on the dissolution, what a contention will arise for Marylebone. Mr. Edwin James—by no means a dull man—will have to combat, not the last publican, but certainly the last author let loose from Paternoster-row.

We are in rags! The great publisher who has given this rising generation of ours books without number of inestimable value has a fight with rags, not with ragamuffins. Mr. Henry Bohn, of Twickenham and Covent-garden, writes in print, in a manly way, against any alteration of the paper duty. "Let me ask a question of you," said a scholar of the Gladstone school in our hearing to a disciple of Mr. Bohn. "What is the difference between income and draw-backs?" Mr. Bohn saw his loss, and retreated from his standard authors to fall back on his standard roses. Twickenham cannot on this occasion be triumphant.

The nation—thus the tongue talks—has done wonderfully well in securing for the nation the very wonderful portrait of Mary Queen of Scots discovered by the historian of Scotland, Mr. Patrick Fraser Tytler, and so admirably done in copy and in small by Mr. Shaw—the Hollar and Vertue of this age. So far from grudging an annual vote of £2000 to Lord Stanhope and Mr. Scharf, were we in the House we would vote and divide on £10,000. Who is to succeed, my Lord Stanhope, my Lord Macaulay as a member of your council? Do not be too aristocratic in your selection.

More monuments. And why not? Yes, Dr. Todd is to have a statue erected somewhere by public subscription. Personally we have no objection to this statue to a man skilled in his way, liked in his profession, and deservedly loved by his friends. But are we not overdoing this "statue business,"—we have "Peterloo" and "Waterloo," folly and heroism. Why should we repeat both?

We remember, not unpleasantly, to have been present at a dinner given, as all gentlemanlike dinners should be given, by a poet and a wit—the wit better than the man's poetry—but the poetry not "sae bad." The talk turned on memorials to men, to urns, to busts, to statues, to out-door monuments, to Kensal Green, from Woking to Westminster Abbey. The man we refer to was the poet of "The Pleasures of Memory"—a man who had read life and books, knew both, and had gained wisdom by his early knowledge. What did this man say (Mr. Dyce and Sharp both have missed the saying)? "To no man should a statue be erected publicly who has not done war-like service for his country. I prefer Shakspeare and Walter Scott to Marlborough and Wellington. I would prefer being either Shakspeare or Scott to being either the hero of Blenheim or the hero of Waterloo. We men of letters—I am a banker proud to be an author—think that such statues in public places should be confined to men who have done deeds in arms." We are not disinclined to agree with what Mr. Rogers said.

We were dining the other day where wines, in spite of Mr. Gladstone, were excellent and cheap; and how did the conversation run? Clever men were present, and we were consequently silent. One clever thing was said, which, in City language, we can indorse: "All literature is running into current literature." We wished the sayer a large, thinly-shaped glass of Mr. Thackeray's first-class bordeaux for his large-typed contributors. But there is truth in the saying. Cowper would have called "The Cornhill Shillingsworth" "The Splendid Shilling." Yet literature of any worth is running too much into current literature.

What do we learn from advertisements? We read them; who does not? We (looking not in an advertisement light) see but one announcement in literature carrying more than a momentary truth of an hereafter to us. And that advertisement is—what? That Mr. John Forster, no unskilled man in the history of the reign of King Charles I., is about to give us a book on "The Arrest of the Five Members." The point on which Mr. Forster's well-sustained knowledge will turn is universal—Hampden and Pym, Falkland and King Charles I.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the Right Hon. Louisa, Countess Dowager of Harewood, late of Goldsborough Hall, Yorkshire, and of Upper Brook-street, Grosvenor-square, London, was proved in the principal registry, on the 18th of February, by the Right Hon. Henry Thynne, Earl of Harewood, the son, and sole executor. The Hon. Egremont William Lascelles, the son, and Charles Henry Mills, Esq., the son-in-law, are appointed trustees. Her Ladyship has left her jewels, trinkets, household furniture, plate, linen, and china, and the carriages and horses, &c., and her residence in Upper Brook-street, to her four unmarried daughters, who are also appointed residuary legatees.

The will and three codicils of Thomas Wood, Esq., of Littleton, Middlesex, Colonel of her Majesty's Regiment of East Middlesex Militia, and Aide de-Camp to her Majesty, were proved in London by his eldest son, Major-General Thomas Wood, the sole executor, the personalty being sworn under £25,000. He has devised his real estates in Cardigan and Carmarthen to his eldest son, and has divided his property amongst his other sons and his daughters, to whom liberal legacies and annuities are bequeathed; and a year's wages to all his servants.

The late Captain James Robert Dalton, R.N., had executed his will in France, dated March 26, 1858, and had made a codicil thereto in July, 1858, which was not admitted to probate from its being unattested. He died at Montreuil-sur-Mer, on the 1st of January, 1860, where he had been resident for thirty years. In 1842 he obtained from Louis Philippe a protection over his property and person almost appertaining to the liberty enjoyed by a French subject; and, with the approbation of our own Board of Admiralty, the Captain was permitted to draw his pay in the same manner as if resident in England. The will was administered to by his relict, the sole executrix, and probate was granted to her so far as regards the property in England and elsewhere, but save and except such part thereof as may be in France. He has appointed his brother, Major-General Charles Dalton, R.A., and his nephew, James Dalton, trustees. He has bequeathed to his wife a life interest in his property, and has appointed his nephew, James Robert Dalton, reversionary residuary legatee. On the decease of his wife he directs his trustees to invest £500, and apply the interest in keeping in repair the tomb of his honoured parents, and of his brother-in-law, General Sir Charles Dalbiac, and his sister, the wife of the General.

Professor Clerk Maxwell, of Marischal College, Aberdeen, has been appointed Bakerian Lecturer for this year by the Royal Society of London.

The Clyde steam-packet, which has arrived at Marseilles from Syria and Smyrna, brings an account of the almost total destruction of the town of Dardanelles by fire in the night of the 10th ult. The part of the town in which the conflagration commenced was that where the foreign Consuls and the principals commercial men reside. Five children are said to have been burnt.

THE PRINCESS CLOTILDE.—A Paris correspondent says that at the late ball at the Tuileries the Princess Clotilde was present. "Her Imperial Highness is far from pretty, but a distinguished French political economist, speaking of her at the ball, declared he considered her the most extraordinarily-endowed lady in Europe. She speaks fluently five languages, and is a thorough Greek and Latin scholar; is well acquainted with the works of all the ancient and modern poets, and is particularly fond of quoting Shakspeare. Her character, in spite of her extreme youth, is very firm: this her face indicates. The Empress is very fond of this her young relative."

MUSIC.

We mentioned last week that Wallace's new opera, "Lurline," had been produced at Covent Garden with complete success. This success is not greater than it is deserved; for this piece is not only the chef-d'œuvre of the composer, but may challenge a comparison with the best German, Italian, or French dramatic music of the present day. The music, however, excellent as it is, suffers from the libretto, which has all the faults of the productions of our English playwrights. The subject, indeed, is happy, but spoiled by wretched treatment. It is one of the fine old legends of the Rhine, of which Lurline, a terrible but captivating being, who inhabits the depths of the river, is the heroine. But the simplicity and wild horror of the tale are entirely lost amid the melodramatic absurdities of the cockney school. Lurline, according to the legend, is a water-nymph, possessed of vast power and irresistible fascination, which she employs for the destruction of men, luring them to their fate by spells and incantations. She is a woman, nevertheless, though a sort of fiend, and loves a mortal with a woman's love. She lures him into the Rhine, but, instead of leaving him to perish in its waves, she conveys him to her caves of coral beneath the waters. After a time she allows him to revisit his home, taking his pledge for his speedy return. But he forgets his water-nymph, and is about to marry another, when the vengeful Lurline makes the river rise and sweep away her faithless lover, his castle, and all that belongs to him. But this terrible catastrophe, though it is the essence of the tale, is avoided by our playwright. He turns the demon of the Rhine into a romantic young lady, and the faithless, mercenary Baron into a pattern lover—makes them, in short, a very interesting couple, and makes them happy at last in the bonds of matrimony. Add to all this the usual garnish of stupid comic characters, and we have a melodramatic dish cooked in the most approved style of our cockney cuisine. We are sorry for this, for the subject, in its own grand simplicity, is eminently capable of inspiring the genius of a musician, while Wallace is a musician capable of being so inspired. Under the disadvantage of having to deal with a quantity of trash, he has, nevertheless, turned everything good that has been left in the subject to the most admirable account, and has produced music—beautiful, expressive, and picturesque—such as might have been written by Weber or Mendelssohn. Such music cannot be described: to be appreciated it must be heard; and our musical readers whose residences in London place them within reach of Covent Garden have at present the means of hearing it in perfection. We have seldom seen an opera more splendidly got up or more admirably performed. There is no room for fine acting, the characters being all reduced to the merest stage commonplace. The terrible nymph of the Rhine is an agreeable and interesting young lady, and such she is made by Miss Louisa Pyne, who is raised above the level of an ordinary mortal only by the ideal beauty of the strains which she warbles. The hero is a walking gentleman; but Mr. Harrison walks well, looks well, and sings superbly. Mr. Santley enacts the part of the Rhine King, a character which affords no room for dramatic talent; but there is some fine music in the part, which, we need scarcely say, he sings beautifully. There are two stupid characters, meant to be comic, which are filled by Mr. Honey and Miss Pilling. This clever young lady sings a pretty ballad so charmingly that it is nightly encored. The manner in which this opera is got up deserves the highest praise. The orchestra and chorus are everything that can be desired, and the scenery and decorations are rich and beautiful. (We give on page 224 of the Supplement an Engraving of one of the most remarkable scenes of this opera.)

The MONDAY POPULAR CONCERT of this week was more than usually interesting. The music was wholly selected from the great old masters of the Italian school, whose works are almost forgotten and unknown to the present generation. There was one of the fine quintets of Boccherini, so dear to the amateurs of the last century; there was a trio of Corelli; and there was Clementi's famous sonata, "Didone Abbandonata," superbly played by Arabella Goddard. The vocal pieces were from the works of Cimarosa, Sarti, and Paesiello, and were exceedingly well sung by Miss Parepa, Miss Cole, Mr. Tennant, and Mr. Winn.

The MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON commenced their second season with a concert in St. James's Hall on Wednesday. Considering that this society numbers about fifteen hundred members and associates—a large audience in themselves—it was not surprising that the hall should be crowded to the ceiling. From this great body—which includes a host of the most eminent musicians in London—we were entitled to expect a first-rate concert in respect both to selection and performance. The selection evinced little research or judgment, and the performance was by no means satisfactory. Of the quality of the selection our musical readers can judge for themselves, for here is the programme:—

PART I.

Overture (Genoveva)	Robert Schumann.
Recit., "Alcandro lo confesso," Signor Belletti	Mozart.
Aria, "Non so donde viene," Signor Belletti	Mozart.
Concertino in D, Violin, Mr. H. G. Blagrove	Ernst.
Scene, "Mon Dieu secouriz moi" (Gustave), Mdlle. Parepa ..	Auber.
Overture (The Wood Nymphs)	W. Sterndale Bennett.

PART II.

Symphony, "Die Weihe der Töne," 1. Largo—Allegro. 2. Andantino. 3 Marcia—Andante maestoso. 4. Larghetto—Allegretto (The Power of Sound). In Memory of the Composer	L. Spohr.
Duo, "Jeri, sul tramontar del sole," "Come frenare," Mdlle. Parepa and Signor Belletti (La Gazza Ladra)	Rossini.
Overture (The Siege of Corinth)	Rossini.

Conductor, Mr. Alfred Mellon.

Schumann's overture was so imperfectly performed (evidently in consequence of insufficient rehearsal) that it was difficult to judge of the merits of the composition. Ernst's concerto did not display the abilities of our excellent Mr. Blagrove to the best advantage. It was ill chosen, not being in the style in which Mr. Blagrove indulges, and its effect was injured by the orchestral accompaniments, which were by no means delicate. The only really satisfactory performance was that of Spohr's symphony, on which due care had been bestowed. We may add that, in consequence of the indisposition of Signor Belletti, his place was supplied by Herr Reichardt.

The Vocal Association will repeat Mendelssohn's psalm, "Hear my Prayer, O God!" on Thursday evening, March 8, at St. James's Hall, with Mdlle. Parepa and choir of 200 voices. Miss Arabella Goddard will perform "The Harmonius Blacksmith" and "Where the bee sucks." These attractive performances terminate at a quarter past ten o'clock.

THE THEATRES, &c.

DRURY LANE.—On Monday the popular drama of "Belphegor" was revived, and a large audience assembled to witness Mr. Dillon's performance of the celebrated mountebank. His acting was marked with its usual force and pathos, and commanded universal applause.

HAYMARKET.—Mr. Tom Taylor has given another dramatic production to the boards, under the title of "The Overland Route." The piece is in three acts, but is not supported by any amount of action or incident, and principally consists of conversation and character. The scene is on board a homeward-bound steamer, sections of which pertaining to the saloon and quarter-deck are cleverly put on the stage. These occupy the two first acts; the third presents the Mazzaffa Reef, Red Sea, at midday. In the scenery we may trace the idea of the drama, which possesses both novelty and originality. The story is but a slender thread whereon to hang the dialogue. The principal character, perhaps, is Tom Dexter (Mr. Charles Mathews), a doctor, who has been an Indian editor, and who becomes jack-of-all-trades to the crew and passengers. The next in importance is Mr. Lovibond, a Singapore merchant (Mr. Buckstone), who left his wife many years ago, threatening to commit suicide on account of her jealous disposition. That wife is now on board, believing her husband dead, and flirting with Major McTurk (Mr. Rogers). The lady is admirably represented by Mrs. Wilkins, who in the course of the play is awfully frightened by the apparition of her husband with his throat cut. Mr. Lovibond, in fact, had gashed himself with shaving, and accidentally intruded into her cabin, but for the rest of the voyage had remained incognito under the name of Downey—a person whose berth he had taken, and who, it appears, had committed forgery. A detective on board arrests and handcuffs him, but at the captain's request, for the honour of the vessel, keeps him quiet. Lovibond and his wife become subsequently acquainted and reconciled, and some farcical fun is obtained by the impossibility of embracing his wife with his hands manacled. At length the vessel is wrecked on the reef, and all the characters in the third act are arrayed in such accidental costume as had been preserved. Many of them are modified in disposition, misfortune having done its work on all, and particularly on the McTurk, who from a bully changes to a coward. Dexter is the soul of the scene, manages the rations, and controls the destinies of others and his own. He prevents the wife of his friend Jack, Mrs. Sebright (Mrs. C. Mathews), from flirting injuriously, as a supposed widow, with Mr. Commissioner Colepepper (Mr. Chippendale) and Sir Solomon Fraser, K.C.B. (Mr. Compton), and successfully achieves his own suit with Miss Colepepper (Miss M. Ternan). Mrs. Sebright's husband, at last, appears as Captain of the Pinnace, which arrives to the rescue of the shipwrecked party. Mr. Taylor has evinced considerable skill in the working of these materials, and causing the dialogue to culminate about the middle of each act in some point of humour that extorts the laughter of the audience, while the curtain is brought down at the end on an effective mechanical situation. The acting was equal to the writing, and the performance, notwithstanding its difficulties, unquestionably successful.

PRINCESS'.—The comedy of "Money" has been revived at this theatre. Mr. Melville, as the hero, acted with judicious reserve, and impressed us with a favourable opinion of his talents for domestic characterisation.

NEW ADELPHI.—A new play in three acts was produced on Monday, written by Mr. Watts Phillips, and entitled "Paper Wings." This, too, is a piece of the conversational kind, but not so felicitous in its execution as the Haymarket drama. The ground, moreover, has been preoccupied by such plays as "The Game of Speculation," which treats the theme more skilfully. The story is slight, and sets forth how Sir Arthur Plynlimmon (Mr. Wigan), a Welsh landowner, is ensnared by one Jonathan Garraway, a city speculator (Mr. D. Fisher), into time-bargains and other Stock-Exchange manœuvres, until ruin threatens and would destroy but for the counterplotting of Mrs. Chicane, Garraway's sister (Mrs. Wigan), who seeks by her services to induce him to become her husband. To his redemption also conduces Owen Percival (Mr. Billington), who by careful speculation secures large profits and wins the hand of Blanche, Sir Arthur's daughter (Miss Simms). Mr. Wigan's acting in this piece is highly artistic and effective; and Mr. Fisher's is exceedingly good. Much, however, is made to depend on one William Kite, Esq., or "Accommodation Bill" (Mr. Toole), who is so overloaded with acceptances and share-papers that he looks like a travelling stationer. This eccentric part is ably supported, and relieves most advantageously the heavier portions of the dialogue. There is much wit and ambition in the general tone of the composition, which was frequently applauded; and the curtain descended on an efficient tableau. The author has emulated the point and sarcasm of our elder comedy; and, as a satire on the times, the piece is not without merit. In the last act there was an exhibition of passionate power, which contributed greatly to the success of the new drama.

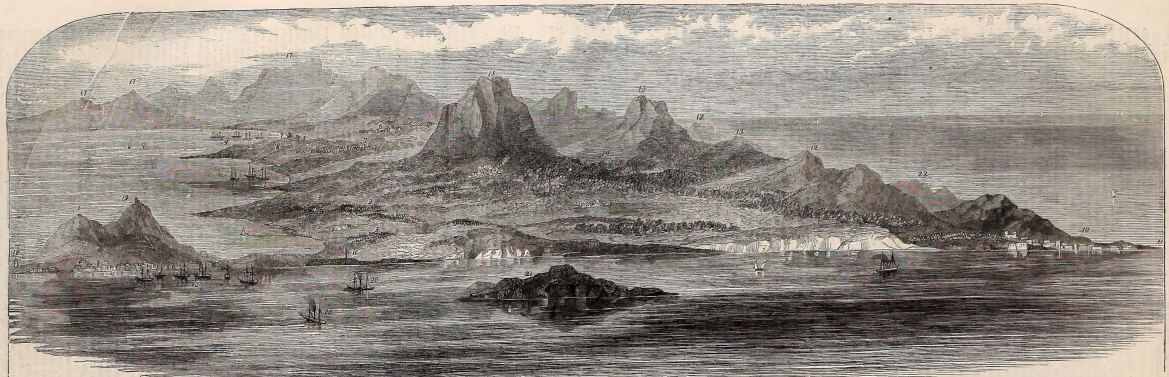
STANDARD.—This house has been very successful lately with a new drama, taken from a contemporary journal, entitled "Holly Bush Hall; or, the Track in the Snow," and which contains some comic scenes of great excellence. Mr. Rayner enacts the guilty hero, Mark Acton, a deserter, with a variety of power; and the action is so arranged as to impart great interest to the story. In the end the prodigal is repentant, and promises to make amends in the future for the past. The drama is followed by a little piece designed for the introduction of a little girl of about nine years of age, called Miss Caroline Benson, who enacts several characters very cleverly. We can see that the young actress is inspired by a laudable enthusiasm, and gives evidence of real talent. The entertainments conclude with the operatic display of Pell, the original "bones," and his troupe of Ethiopian serenaders, which is capitally conducted, and includes the admirable performance of the little black Picco, and the wonderful dancing of Frank Diamond. The opening of the pantomime is still acted, and the transformation scene maintains for the present its attraction.

PRIVATE THEATRICALS.—The Honourable Artillery Company had a performance at head-quarters on Wednesday. The pieces were "Still Waters Run Deep," "Box and Cox," and "Charles the Second." The company was brilliant and numerous.

At the Gallery of Illustration, Mr. and Mrs German Reed in "Our Home Circuit," and in "Seaside Studies," continue to attract crowded audiences. Mrs. Reed, in the character of Mrs. Naggit, being nightly encored in the song of "Let us all speak our minds if we die for it."

SALMON OVA FOR AUSTRALIA.—By the kind permission of Sir Watkin Wynn and Mr. Edmund Buckley, about 30,000 salmon ova were lately obtained from the River Dovey, and were safely deposited, in beautiful condition, in the boxes prepared with gravel for them on board the ship S. Curling, which sailed from Liverpool on the 25th ult. for Melbourne. The apparatus is so arranged that the ova will receive a continuous stream of pure cold water all the voyage out, the water running through an ice-house, containing fifteen tons of Wenham Lake ice, before it flows over the ova.

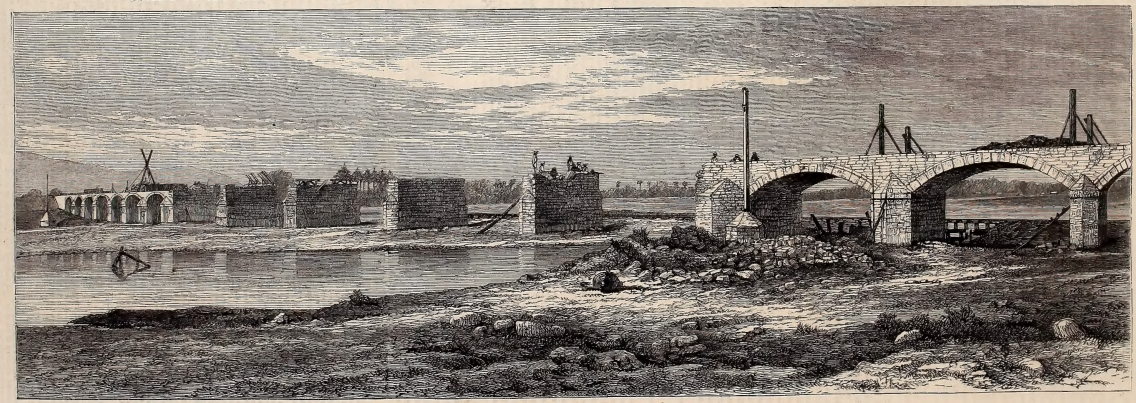
THE LIVINGSTONE EXPEDITION.—The Cape Town mail has brought intelligence of the arrival of H.M.S Lynx from the Zambesi at Cape Town. Dr. Livingstone and his party were, in December, at the delta of the Zambesi, after a second journey up the Shire to Lake Shirwa and Lake Nyassa. Mr. Baines, the artist, has been compelled from ill health to visit the Cape in the Lynx, but will return again to the Zambesi. Mr. Thornton, the geologist, has gone on an independent expedition into the interior; and Dr. Livingstone and the rest of the party were to visit the Makololo country. Their steam-launch is now worn out and wholly useless. Mrs. Livingstone will rejoin the doctor at the Zambesi on the return of the Lynx, instead of coming to England, as she contemplated.



ALLEGED RUSSO-AUSTRIAN TREATY.—Some excitement was caused by the publication, in a second edition of the Morning Chronicle last Saturday, of an announcement from Vienna that a treaty had been concluded between Austria and Russia, on the following bases:—"1. The most ample concessions as to all that regards the holy places at Jerusalem will be made by Austria to Russia. 2. With a view to eventualities that have every probability of being realised, Austria agrees to conform her policy to that of Russia as to the Danubian Provinces and Servia. 3. In compensation for these concessions in the East and on the Danube, Russia will guarantee to Austria the whole of her territory, including Hungary and Venetia, against insurrection and foreign foes." The truth of this statement has, however, been stoutly denied in all quarters. A telegram from Berlin declares the report to be totally unfounded; the Indépendance Belge declares that it is not simply improbable, but radically false; and the Pays and Patrie give to it a flat denial. From Vienna we learn—"The announcement of a treaty between Russia and Austria is without foundation; but it is asserted that Austria, although not bound by such a treaty, will no more oppose the Russian policy in Turkey." In the House of Commons on Thursday, Lord J. Russell said that the Government had been informed by the Ministers abroad that there was no such treaty.

A correspondent of the Bombay Times describes the killing of a tiger by strychnine. The tiger infested some low undergrowth at the bottom of his garden, and he resolved to destroy it. He therefore took a buffalo recently killed by the tiger and strewed a quantity of strychnine in the bitten flesh. The tiger came, ate as usual, and died immediately.

A fire has occurred at Brantford, Canada West, destroying twenty-three buildings in Market-street. The amount of loss is variously estimated at from 100,000 to 200,000 dollars. A fire at Branford, Connecticut, has also destroyed property to the value of 60,000 dollars.



RAILWAY BRIDGE IN INDIA.

THE bridge over the Palar River, in the district of North Arcot, is one of the most conspicuous structures on the line of the Madras Railway. Great difficulties have had to be contended with, as the bed of the river is composed of shifting sand, and the foundations for the piers have had to be sunk thirty-five feet below the river-bed, in order to secure a firm bottom. All impediments have been overcome by the indefatigable engineer, Mr. Edward Johnston, who has succeeded when others, his predecessors, have failed. The bridge was originally intended to have been entirely composed of arches of seventy feet span, but the plan has been modified, and the actual bed of the river will now be crossed by iron girders. The piers are composed of a handsome white gneiss, and the bridge will form a very picturesque object when completed. Our Engraving is from a photograph taken by Captain Norton, Staff Officer of Arcot.

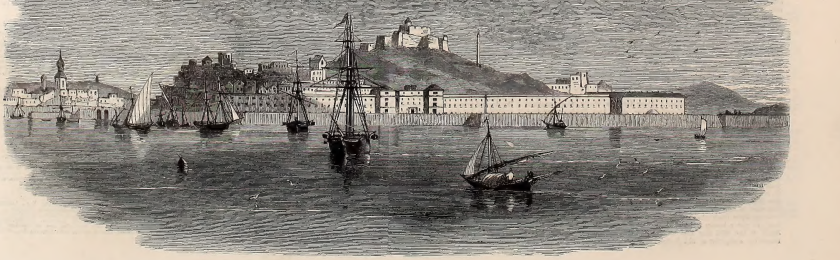
GENERAL PRIM.

General Prim, or Count de Reuss, left Spain for Morocco in command of the Reserve Division, consisting of eight battalions. The term "reserve" seems in this instance to have been rather inappropriate, for on numerous occasions, before the army left the lines round Ceuta, and subsequently at Castillejos, on the 1st of January, and at the passage of the Cape Negro Cordillera, on the 14th of December, Prim and his battalions were in advance, and bore the brunt of the fighting. It would hardly suit an officer of Prim's character and impetuous courage to be stationed in the rear as a support, instead of being sent forward to clear the way. No General holding a command in the Spanish expedition to Morocco possesses in a higher degree than the Count de Reus the confidence and esteem of his comrades. In the unhappy civil contests of his country he won himself a reputation which the African war has augmented. Calm, cool, and cheerful in the midst of great peril, his mere aspect inspires with fresh courage the battalions, in front of which he often throws himself, sword in hand, to lead them—himself in the post of the greatest peril—in a charge against the enemy.

In the action of Castillejos his bravery was most conspicuous. With two glittering stars upon his breast, and his gold-headed General's cane in his hand, he was forward among the balls, generally on foot, and, to everybody's wonder, remained, as hitherto in the war, without a scratch. On one occasion, when a part of his scanty force, thinned by the Moorish bullets, and pressed upon by superior numbers, showed signs of wavering, he seized the colours of a battalion and sprang forward, with the words, "I take this flag to the Moors!" The soldiers rushed after him, and repulsed the enemy.

At the attack on the Moorish breastworks in front of Tetuan, on the 4th of February, considerable loss was occasioned to Prim's corps by a heavy fire of espingardas which met its right wing as it approached the brushwood and copse that covered the left of the position. Prim was, as usual, forward in the fight. He had with him 400 or 500 Catalan volunteers, who joined the army the day before the battle. Prim, himself a Catalan, harangued them on the day of their arrival in the dialect of their province, and those persons present who comprehended him say he made a most telling speech. As they marched forward on the 4th of February the brilliant red of their caps distinguished them from the rest of the army, and many on seeing them predicted that, although mere recruits, they would vie in daring with the oldest soldiers. On the eve of the battle Prim, talking with some friends, is said to have exclaimed, "Happy the man who to-morrow first enters the breach!" That man was none other than Don Juan Prim. Sabre in hand, he dashed up the parapet, cutting down a Moor who would have barred his passage. The Catalans were not far behind; their commandant was killed and their loss heavy. It was towards the centre of the long line of parapet that Prim entered, at the most stoutly-defended position. General Prim is now in command of General Zabala's second corps, the latter having been compelled by sickness to return to Spain. As usual, the Spanish Picton takes the lead with his fighting division. The last news we hear of him is that he has been making reconnissances in the direction of Tangier, far in advance of the bulk of the Spanish army which at present is in the occupation of Tetuan and its neighbourhood.

The Portrait we publish of General Prim is from a photograph taken after the action of Castillejos.



GENERAL PRIM, COMMANDING THE SECOND CORPS OF THE SPANISH ARMY IN MOROCCO.

SIR ROWLAND HILL.

The Secretary to the Post Office, Sir Rowland Hill, was a few weeks since made a Knight Commander of the Bath, civil division. It is to this gentleman's untiring zeal that we are indebted for the benefits of the penny postage upon all inland correspondence; for the introduction of a uniform charge, regulated, not by distance, but by weight; and for many other reductions in the rates of foreign and colonial postage. In 1837 he published a pamphlet developing his new postage system, and in the same year the House of Commons appointed a Committee upon the subject, which, in 1838, recommended his plan for adoption, the evidence brought before them proving that injurious effects resulted from the old state of things to the commerce and industry of the country, and to the social habits and moral condition of the people. In the next Session more than two thousand petitions were presented to Parliament in favour of the plan; and in 1839-40, after a brief period of a fourpenny postage, to feel the way, the penny postage was carried into effect, with the assistance of Sir Rowland Hill, who, however, was discharged from his duties by the Government in 1843. His plan of a penny postage having succeeded, he was rewarded, in 1846, by a public testimonial of £13,360. Sir Rowland next became engaged in the management of the London and Brighton Railway; but in 1854 he was recalled to the Post Office, and appointed Secretary in the room of Colonel Maberly. Sir Rowland is one of the family of Mr. Thomas Hill, a schoolmaster in Birmingham, whose four sons have all attained distinction in their several professions; and the subject of our Sketch is recognised as a man of rare mechanical and mathematical genius, indomitable perseverance, and great firmness.

CARTHAGENA, SPAIN.

Carthagena, or Cartageen (the Carthago Nova of the ancients, it having been a principal colony of the Carthaginians), is a city and a seaport, and the chief naval arsenal of Spain. It lies on the coast of Murcia, a few leagues west of Alicante, occupying the declivity of a hill and a small plain extending to the harbour, which is one of the best in the Mediterranean, and protected from all winds by surrounding heights, and by an island on the south, which, as well as the city, is fortified. In its western division are an arsenal, docks for building ships of war, and a bagne for galley-slaves. Its port communicates with the Segura River by the Lorca Canal. The manufacture of cordage and canvas is carried on by the inhabitants, but they trade in barilla and agricultural produce, and prosecute the tunny fishery with considerable success. The mines of Carthagena, originally wrought by the Carthaginians, were rediscovered a few years ago. Carthagena was taken by Scipio B.C. 210, at which period it was, so Livy states, one of the richest cities in the world. It was ruined by the Goths, and its modern importance dates only from the time of Philip II. The population of the place is about 35,000. A line of railway from this town, to join the Alicante line at Albacete, is shortly to be commenced, by which means Carthagena will be brought into direct railway communication with Madrid.

THE FARM.

The interest of the forthcoming Royal Dublin Show will be much enhanced this year by some additional cups. Mr. James Gaily, the salesman of the society in the showyards for many years past, gives a £50 cup to be competed for by the yearling bulls; while the best bulls of any breed, over two and under five years old, are to have bulls of any breed, over two and under five years old, are to have their chance for the £125 Irish Railway Challenge Cup. Besides these two, there are also the £155 Irish Farmers' Gazette Plate, which Mr. Eastwood now holds with Lucette; £220 in money; one hundred medals, including six gold ones; and forty honorary certificates. The sheep department is, however, rather weakened; and it is to be hoped that there will soon be some sheep cups both on the show-yard and in the Royal Irish Agricultural Show. The list of the Royal Dublin and Royal Irish Agricultural Shows. The latter is to be held at Cork this year, and we understand that a prize of £25 is to be given for the best thoroughbred weight-carrying sire, in addition to the Cork Challenge Cup. Dr. Barker, of Blarney, is so convinced of the efficacy of the Turkish vapour-bath upon cows suffering from pleuro-pneumonia, that he offered, through Captain Hall, to give it a full operation at the Cork Show, if a price were fixed. This was done, out of eight cows, seven were cured. Had one been given. He stated that, out of the seven, one had not suffered in with only one result, and that the convalescents had not suffered in their milk: but the society had no funds available for the purpose. It is said that the same means are being used by Mr. Gordon in Northamptonshire for sweating hunters.

We hear that it is in contemplation among the Sussex breeders to establish a Herd Book for their cattle, similar to that kept for the three other leading breeds.

The Farmer's Magazine proceeds with its lives of English Agricultural Worthies; and Mr. Cuthbert Johnson has selected Mr. Thomas Turner, the author of "A Hundred Days' Farming at Sandhill," as his subject. He was born, it seems, in 1815, and began life as a chorister at Wallingford. Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge, were his next stages, and at Ketwade, and then at Fairstead, in Sussex. In his time a haymaker thought himself well off, as money went, with 5d. a day; and a bailiffe was right proud to get £6 a year. Mr. Turner frequently herd is the one for the mouth, and the histories of his Smithfield winners—Prince and Nina Lassens—of Mr. Druce, of Reform, and of Mr. Overman, with those of his celebrated bulls, Duc, proud, are interwoven with those of his friends, Mr. Mash, mes O'Connell, Buchan Hery, Rockingham, &c. We also find the Duke of Richmond and Mr. Rose, from whom the celebrated Royal Butterfly line is descended.

"Why are the hens lay!" is a question which has been asked in America and England pretty frequently, and the following are the general rules laid down by an American correspondent:—

"In the summer the fowls obtain an abundance of animal food—worms, grasshoppers, bugs, and other insects. In the winter these supplies are cut off. Try feeding them, then, a little of animal meat, and see how eagerly they will devour them. Some kind of animal food or other indispensable for laying hens, and if an offensive made a good substitute. Scraps or meat-cake, easily obtained in any large country and cheaply from the butcher's stall, are very good for fowls in this city it is sold at a low price, in large cakes the size of a barrel-head, and eight to twelve inches thick—sometimes in a square form. The price is about two cents per pound, per ton—one cent per pound. Let the fowls have meat in some form, in summer four times a week, and in winter every day. Scrap-cake, bone-lovers, turnip-tops, or potatoes or turnips boiled. Corn is passably good for fattening, but not to make hens lay, except with Oats occasion are egg material.

To lay well they should have warm quarters, where water will scarcely freeze. Let them always have plenty of unfrozen water; snow is a poor substitute. A dry, sandy, gravelly place, or at least access to gravel: without time they cannot make eggshells. Finely-powdered bone or oyster-shells are also needful; supply these, which they must have in some form. They have constitutional objections to laying eggs without shells. An ash-heap, to roll in, is good to keep off insects. Access to the sun on mild days in winter will plainly show you is a treat they enjoy. In short, give them meat or milk for meat, food, with meat, water, gravel, a dry, warm place to shelter; plenty of water to drink, and to supply the liquid part of the egg; as much mixed grain as they can eat, and gravel to grind it with; oyster-shells, bones, with air and sunlight, to keep them healthy; and you will unseal the egg-fountains. The nearer their wants are met, and habits and appetites regarded in the manner, the nearer will the supply of eggs be equalised." We know a fowl-fancier in the suburbs of London who has reduced his bay very closely with only six hens for two years, and during that time he has had 1515 eggs exactly, without the slightest advantages as to artificial warmth, and, in fact, with very inferior accommodation altogether.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

CONSIDERING the nearness of the "Grand National Steeplechase," the betting on that event has not been spirited, though Jealousy has had some slight support. The Lizard is firm for the Two Thousand, at 9 to 2; and Buccaneer was in force once more, at 10 to 1, for the Derby, only a point behind Miantanomo and Upas. The Liverpool week will occupy next week—to wit, Liverpool on Tuesday and Wednesday, and Shrewsbury on Thursday and Friday.

Lord Zetland's hill has had well-win very little mercy at the hands of Admiral Rous, who will, it is said, try to pass a Jockey Club resolution limiting the lowest weight in racing to 7 st. 7 lb., on the principle that they cannot split the difference. A portrait and biography of the Admiral are among the leading articles of Bailey's Magazine of Sports and Pastime; which also contains the first of a series of articles on the English racehorse by that well-known turf leader, as well as several others on different branches of sport. It is to be published monthly, at eighteenpence, and is quite a new feature in sporting literature.

The old Sporting Magazine is embellished this month with a portrait and biography of Baron Ippolyte Petchili, who has been a celebrity in Suffolk; and Leopold has gone into Lincolnshire, vice Cubberdale.

Lord Middleton's resignation has come very suddenly on the East Riding, and they are to hold a meeting on Saturday to make arrangements about hunting the Spaniards by subscription for the next few years of his absence. Had the weather been propitious, "the little sporting metropolis" of Lambourn would have been here in such glory. It is very full of visitors, but the weather was so stormy on Monday that the hounds could not run a yard. On the next day the second Queen Mab, by Queen of Trumps, was found to hear, with a serious accident. Poor George Wells, the excellent huntsman of the South Wiltshire, died last Friday morning. This was his first season as huntsman. He was nephew of the celebrated Wells, and whipped-in to his uncle for many years to Mr. Walker with the Wynnstay. Fifty-five of the late Mr. Reeves the dealer's horses were sold on Monday at Tattersall's, and realised 3414 gs.

The Waterloo meeting has been successful, but still rather flat, and no fault was found with Mr. Dalzell this time. Selby, who was suspected by many before he divided the cup with Clive last time to be a very brilliant but uncertain dog, seemed hardly to try at all. The Cumberland people backed their favourite, Maid of the Mill, very heavily, and she made light work of Lord Sefton's Sam pier in the deciding course. Still Blue Hat, the commonlooking little Irish champion, would have teased her amazingly if he had a bit got a heavy fall and a single-handed course the day before. Maid of the Mill has won well both this season and last, and is a beautiful daughter of old Judge. His leggy racing stock are, like himself of old, very great over the Altcar meadows, and two of his sons also ran up for the Purse and Plate at the Waterloo last week. Wild Wave, whose style of running pleased us amazingly last year, won the latter in very brilliant style. Baldock (Sapling), on Monday; Thorney (Sapling), on Tuesday; (Lanark (open), on Thursday; and Crosby, on Saturday, are the meetings for next week.

The annual festival in support of the ancient charity of St. Patrick will be held this year as usual at the Freemasons' Tavern, on the 17th of March, under the patronage of Lord Mayo. It is the intention of Irish vite volunteers to attend in uniform on the occasion to promote the objects of the charity.

The Council of the Society of Arts has approved the guarantee fund for raising a sum of not less than £250,000, for the exhibition proposed to be held in London in 1862, and Lord Granville, the Marquis of Cholmondeley, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Thomas Fairbairn, of Manchester, have been named as the trustees of the fund.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

ALTHOUGH the amount of business doing in National Stocks during the present week has been limited, the tone of the market is decidedly firm, and our gold imports continue to be absorbed for the Continent, the market value of which is now considerably above the mint price at which it is quoted. There has, however, been much less activity in the demand for Indian paper, as the supply of bills on the spot has fallen off, and holders of the debt of India have already been transferred to this country. Prices of Government securities, both for money and the account, have fluctuated little.

Increased ease has been apparent in the value of money for commercial purposes. The supply of surplus capital in the hands of the bankers and the discount houses has been plentiful, and the rate of the Bank short loan has been taken at 2 to 2½ per cent. Three months' paper has been discounted at from 2½ to 2¾ per cent, and the Bank of England advances at 4 to 4½ per cent.

Although important alteration have taken place in the foreign exchanges, about £26,000 in gold has been withdrawn from the Bank of England, and the whole of the amount, with the exception of a trifling sum, has been shipped for shipment to the Continent. The next steamer for India will take out about £176,000 in specie, chiefly in sovereigns and Mexican dollars. Investments, however, are not likely to produce any immediate change in the value of money at the Bank of England.

The transfer-books at the Bank will be closed for the dividends on the 5th inst., and re-opened on the 17th of April.

The following return shows the state of the note circulation in the United Kingdom during the four weeks ending January 14:—

Bank of England	£21,881,435
Private Banks	3,044,230
Joint-Stock Banks	5,844,240
Scotland	3,305,145
Ireland	7,361,781
Total	£41,446,831

The above figures show an increase in the circulation, when compared with the corresponding period in 1859, of £1,925,806.

Railway Shares have been dull in the market, at about last week's quotations.

Prosperity has been given to the directors of the Atlantic Telegraph Company to raise £50,000 to carry out operations for the repair of the cable.

The Madras Irrigation Company have paid into the Indian Treasury £30,000 on account.

A dividend of 6d. in the pound will be paid to the creditors of the Royal British Bank in May.

The dealings in the shares of the newly formed companies have been only limited. The Imperial Mercantile have sold at 2½ to 2½ premium; Land, 1 to 1 premium; London and Provincial Marine, 3-16 to 5-16 prem.; Bank of Hindostan, 1 to 1½ prem.; London Joint-Stock Bowser Purifier, 1 to 1½ prem.; and San Fernando Railway, 3 to 1 prem.; and Folkestone West Cliff Hotel, 1 to 1½ prem.

English Stocks ruled steady at price on Monday:—Bank Stock marked 231; Three per Cents Reduced, 95½; Three per Cents Consols, 95½; Ditto, Five-and-a-Half per Cent. Consols were done at 94½; the Reduced ditto at 94½; New Three per Cents, 94½; Long Annuities, 1885, 17½; India Five per Cents, 1861 103½; Ditto, 1859, 103½; Ditto, 1858, 103½; Ditto Enfaced Paper, 101½; Ditto Five per Cent Paper, 98; Ditto Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104; Exchequer Bills, 1860, 1s. to 3s. prem.; Ditto, Small, 1s. to 3s. prem.; Bank of England Stock left off at 231; the Reduced, 95¾; Consols, for Money and Account, 95¾; New Three per Cents, 95¾; Long Annuities, 17 13-16; India Stock, 218 to 221; Ditto Five per Cent Paper, 98; Ditto Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104; Exchequer Bills, 1860, 1s. to 3s. prem.; Ditto, Small, 1s. to 3s. prem. On Tuesday very little business was done in the English Funds. Bank Stock left off at 231; Reduced and Consols sold at 94¾ for Money, and 95 to 95¾ for the New Account on April 11. Three per Cents Reduced, 95¾; Consols, 95¾; New Three per Cents, 95¾; India Stock, 218 to 221; India Loan, 104 to 3; Ditto, Debentures, 97½; Ditto, Five per Cent Paper, 98; Ditto, Five-and-a-Half per Cent, 104; Ditto, Enfaced Rupee Five-and-a-Half per Cent Paper was 103½; the Five per Cents were 101 to 3. Scarcely any change has been in the quotations on Wednesday. Consols, for Money, were 94¾; Ditto, for Account, 95¾; the Reduced and New Three per Cents, 95¾; Long Annuities, 17 13-16; India Stock, 218 to 221; paper ruled about stationary.

On the Stock Exchange no extensive business has been passing in Foreign Bonds, and prices almost generally have been well supported. ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

THE Church of St. George-in-the-East, Ratcliff Highway, is a bold and massive building, and of large dimensions. The architect was Hawksmoor. By an inscription under the clock in the organ gallery we find that the church was opened July 19, 1729. The approach to the church from the street is by a paved broad passage way, which extends nearly to the eastern end on each side, and thence into the burial-ground. A large flight of steps leads to the main entrance, under the tower. The church is an old-fashioned gloomy piece of architecture, substantial in form. The ceiling is a depressed cove, divided into three bays by two arches, enriched with roses in squares; the centre bay being about double the size of the two end ones. The roof is supported by four columns and massive piers. There are three spacious galleries—an organ gallery, and one on the north and south sides. The chancel end of the church, which we give in our Engraving, it will be seen, is semicircular in form, with coved heading, enriched with roses in panels. There are some very indifferently-painted glass windows—the three centre ones representing Faith, Hope, and Charity; beneath which is seen, in an inclined position, the cross. Under these, also, is the decoration so much complained of lately, and which is certainly quite at variance with the character of the architecture of the church. Over the altar-table is a frame upon which figures a large cross; in front of this stands a Gothic metal cross, not very large. On each side of this lesser cross is a candlestick corresponding in pattern. Drapery hangs around the walls to the ground, displaying the old credence-tables.

INTERIOR OF THE CHURCH OF ST. GEORGE-IN-THE-EAST.

THE "JOHN PENN."

THE subject of our Engraving, the new mail-packet John Penn, left the Thames on Saturday, the 18th ult., and accomplished the distance from Blackwall to Dover, eighty-nine miles, in a few minutes over five hours, being at the rate of nearly eighteen miles an hour. On the same evening she conveyed the Indian and Australian mails, consisting of 220 boxes, shipped in less than half an hour, and weighing nearly six tons, from Dover to Calais (twenty-one miles) in one hour and twenty-three minutes. The whole of the mails were in the train at Calais an hour before the regular time of starting.

The John Penn is the ninth vessel employed in conveying the mails between Dover, Ostend, and Calais. She is 175 feet in length, 20 feet beam, and propelled by oscillating engines of 150 horses nominal power, by the Messrs. Penn, of Greenwich, after the eminent head of which firm the vessel is named. She is a beautiful model, built by the Thames Shipbuilding Company, from designs by Mr T. Ash. It was anticipated that she would prove the fastest vessel of her class, and the most efficient on the station; and she has fully justified these opinions, for in her trial-trip on the Thames, under the most adverse circumstances, it blowing nearly a gale of wind at the time, she realised a speed of over 15½ knots.

Every novelty and modern improvement is fully carried out in her, including Sir W. Harris's compasses, Newbon's anchor-lift, Penn's paddle-box and mast-head lights, and boilers of manipulated steel, by Messrs. Atkinson and Son, of Sheffield; the shaft and other portions of the machinery are also of steel.

IMPERIAL DRIVE IN THE BOIS DE BOULOGNE.

WHEN the little Prince Imperial is taken for an airing in the Bois de Boulogne, or elsewhere, he is accompanied by a military escort, and other signs of Imperial state consistent with his dignity as heir-apparent to the throne of France. Of course he is thus guarded not so much for safety, but rather as a matter of ceremony, and to make his Highness's presence known to such as might otherwise unwittingly "stop the way." His august parents, on the contrary, avoid such display, and their Imperial Majesties generally take their afternoon drive without escort, and preceded by a single outrider, as shown in our Illustration. It is pleasant to remark this difference, as it gives a very good idea of the security with which the Emperor and Empress circulate in their promenades in the French capital, and furnishes a proof, if at present any proof were wanting, of their great popularity with the Parisian population. Our Engraving in the present Number represents one of these Imperial drives, of which the sketch was taken as the Emperor and Empress were returning recently from the Bois de Boulogne to the Palace of the Tuileries.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

The Planet Vulcan.—The probable position of this newly-discovered planet on July 18 next, when the eclipse of the Sun takes place, is exciting the attention of French astronomers. Some remarks on the subject appear in Cosmos.

"Connaissance des Temps," the French "Nautical Almanack," has been lately most rigorously attacked, on account of its errors and deficiencies, by M. Leverrier, the French Astronomer Royal, at a recent sitting of the French Academy. A stormy discussion took place. It is hoped that an improvement in the execution of the work will be the result.

The North China Sugar-cane (Sorghum Saccharatum).—In the new number of the Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society of England appear remarks upon and analyses of the composition of this new graminaceous plant, by Dr. A. Voelcker, of the Royal Agricultural College, Cirencester. The plant appears to be largely cultivated in North America, on account of its sugar and the spirit obtained from it. The author thinks that the cultivation of sorghum in England, for distillation, would not be remunerative, and that repeated trials are needed before we can finally pronounce on its value for the manufacture of sugar, or on its merits as a feeding stuff for cattle. (The Journal de Pharmacie for February contains an account of a red dye obtained from this plant.)

Phosphorescence in the Eye.—A memoir on this subject was read lately before the French Imperial Academy of Medicine by M. Jules Regnauld, and an abstract appears in the Journal de Pharmacie. The results of his experiment show that in man and some other of the mammalia the cornea and the crystalline humour are endowed with a manifest phosphorescence, and that the retina possesses it also, but in a less degree. M. Regnauld attributes this phosphorescence to the prolonged action of intense light, particularly of the violet rays; and thinks that the electric light, if generally introduced, will become injurious, unless a way can be devised for cutting off the extreme violet rays. As the general introduction of the electric light is now much advocated in England and France, M. Regnauld thinks the subject demands investigation.

The Causes of the Cold upon High Mountains are discussed by the eminent meteorologist, M. Ch. Martins, in the new number of the Annales de Chimie. An account is given of the experiments made by the author and MM. Auguste and Camille Bravais with respect to the heating of the soil and atmosphere of high mountains and the physical causes of the great cold experienced on them. The latter M. Martins considers to be due to the much greater amount of radiation of heat on mountains than on plains, especially during the night (which radiation rapidly increases as we ascend); to the radiation from snow to evaporation; and to the dilatation of the air of ascending currents. Tables of results are given, and many interesting phenomena described. In conclusion, remarks are made on the physiological causes of the sensation of cold, and of death by cold, against which moral energy is the great safeguard. Sleep must be resisted and every kind of muscular exertion maintained, such as walking, stamping, beating the chest, &c. Jacques Balmat, who first ascended Mont Blanc in 1786, knew this well. He was benighted in the midst of a large plateau, and saved his life by walking to and fro till dawn. M. Martins describes the escape of himself and friends and guides from the exciting perils of a thunderstorm in the night upon Mont Blanc. This memoir will be welcomed by all interested in the subject.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

Professor Tyndall resumed his lectures on Thursday (last week) with an account of the two leading theories of the nature of light. The "emission" theory, held by Newton and his followers, supposes that light consists of particles projected from the luminous body. It prevailed till 1801, when Dr. Thomas Young, Professor of Natural Philosophy in the Royal Institution, revived the undulatory or wave theory of Huyghens, which supposes that light consists of waves propagated through the luminiferous ether, as sound is through the air. This latter theory, the one now generally received, was elucidated by explanations and experiments on the propagation of sound, by tuning-fork, the voice, &c. The colours of the spectrum correspond to the pitch of sound, the extreme violet being less than an octave higher than the extreme red of the spectrum. This has been proved by a calculation of the number of vibrations in a second. According to the emission theory, light passes more quickly through liquids and solids than through air and space. The undulatory theory, by experiment, has proved the contrary to be the case. Darkness is an absence of motion in the particles. As waves of water may neutralise each other, so may waves of sound and waves of ether. Thus by adding to motion we can produce rest, by adding sound to sound we can produce silence, by adding light to light we can produce darkness. On this action, termed interference, Dr. Young founded the theory of undulation. The rate at which light travels (about 190,000 miles in a second) was determined by Bradley and Römer, and has been verified in an ingenious manner by Fizeau, the recently-elected member of the French Academy of Sciences. The lecture was illustrated with several beautiful experiments, showing waves produced on the surface of mercury, the colours of thin films, as seen in the soap-bubble, oils poured on water, &c.

Dr. W. B. Carpenter, F.R.S., Registrar of the University of London, gave the Friday evening discourse "On the Relation between the Vital and Physical Forces." Sir Henry Holland, Bart., was in the chair. The object of the discourse was to show that, whilst there is in forms of living beings a peculiar directive agency, which, derived as the special attribute of each germ from its parent, determines the plan of construction according to which the form shall build itself up into an organised fabric, this would be inoperative without the concurrence of an active force from without; on the supply of which, therefore, all living action is made immediately dependent. The force seems to be heat; for, putting aside the case of warm-blooded animals, which have their source of heat within themselves, we find there is so close a correspondence between the measure of heat supplied and the amount of vital activity manifested in growth and development as to indicate that heat, acting through the organic germ, becomes vital force, just as when applied to the vaporisation of liquids it becomes elastic force. For the growth of plants we know that light also is essential; but its agency would seem to be limited to the promotion of that chemical change by which the plant is enabled to form those organic compounds that constitute the material of its tissues from the carbonic acid, water, and ammonia of the inorganic world. When, as in germination, the plant is growing at the expense of materials already prepared, light is rather injurious than beneficial. In the decay which is constantly taking place during the life of a plant, as well as after its death, the materials of its fabric are restored to the inorganic world in their pristine form; and, however slow may be the process of decomposition, it really liberates the same amount of heat as if the same materials were to undergo a rapid combustion. Thus the heat which was metamorphosed into vital force is given out again in the same form, just as the heat which is converted into elastic force when water is boiled reappears when the steam is condensed. The discourse was illustrated by a very interesting diagram, showing how the vegetable kingdom derives water, carbonic acid, and ammonia from the inorganic world, and, by the agency of the physical forces, light and heat, combines them into starch, sugar, oil, and albumen, which are taken up and applied by the animal kingdom, and eventually restored to the inorganic world in their original state.

Dr. E. Lankester delivered his fifth lecture "On the Relations of the Animal Kingdom to the Industry of Man" on Saturday last, the subject being wool, hair, feathers, and other appendages of the skin. The nature of the epidemic appendages in plants and animals was first described, and the microscopic structure of hair, wool, and feathers illustrated. The uses of hair and bristles, the manufacture of wool and worsted, the history and applications of furs, feathers, and fish scales were successively brought before the audience. An account was given of the trade in furs carried on by the Hudson's Bay Company. The lecture was illustrated by a fine collection of furs of all kinds lent by Mr. Nicholay, of Oxford-street; by bristles and brushes from Mr. Newton, of Princes-street; by birds and feathers from Mr. Leadbeater, of Brewer-street; and by ostrich feathers and fish-scale ornaments from Mr. Foster, of Wigmore-street.

Professor Owen delivered his seventh lecture "On Fossil Reptiles" on Tuesday last. From the order Dinosauria he selected for more especial comment the genus iguanodon, the great herbivorous land reptile, remains of which were first found in the Weald of Sussex. In 1822 the quarrymen gave some teeth to Mrs. Mantell. Her husband, then a young surgeon of Lewes, sent them to the great Cuvier, who pronounced them to belong to an unknown animal, probably an "herbivorous reptile." Subsequent discoveries proved the conjecture to be correct; and, the teeth being found to correspond to those of the iguano lizard only, Dr. Mantell named the newly-found creature "iguanodon." A large specimen of this ancient reptile may be seen at the British Museum. Some of the thigh-bones found measure four feet; and traces of its huge three-toed foot have been seen near Hastings. Remains of the order Dinosauria begin to appear in the lias, increase in the oolite, and disappear in the wealden strata.

A Parliamentary Reform meeting was held yesterday se'nnight in the Queen's Theatre, Dublin—the Lord Mayor presiding. Resolutions in favour of the extended franchise, the ballot, and the removal of the present restrictions on the obtainment of the franchise were adopted.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE BISHOP OF ROCHESTER.

The Right Rev. George Murray, D.D., Lord Bishop of Rochester, was the eldest surviving son of the Right Rev. Lord George Murray, Bishop of St. David's, by his wife, Anne Charlotte, daughter of Lieutenant-General Francis Grant, and was the grandson of John Murray, third Duke of Atholl, and last King of Man. He was born on the 12th of January, 1784, and was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, at which university he graduated B.A. in 1806, and M.A. in 1810. He was consecrated Bishop of Sodor and Man in April, 1813, and was made a Doctor of Divinity in 1814. In 1827 he was translated to the see of Rochester. His Lordship, who had for some time been Dean of Worcester, was Provincial Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Bishop married, on the 9th of May, 1811, Lady Sarah Maria Hay Drummond, second daughter of Robert Auriol, ninth Earl of Kinnoul, and by her, who survives him, he has had five sons, four of whom survive him, and six daughters—viz., Harriet, Marchioness Camden, who died on the 22nd of December, 1854; Caroline Sophia, wife, first, of Sir John Mordaunt, Bart., and, secondly, of G. T. Smith, Esq., of Galdicote House, in the county of Warwick; Augusta Anne, Lady Pakington, who died on the 23rd of February, 1848; Sarah Maria, wife of Robert Capel Cure, Esq., of Blake Hall, Essex; Mary Louisa, wife of the Rev. Jermyn Pratt, Rector of Campsey Ashe, Suffolk; and Eleanor Margaret, the wife of John Jolliffe Tuffnell, Esq., of Langleys, Essex. The Bishop of Rochester, who was much loved and respected in his diocese, and by all who knew him, died on the 16th ult. at his town house, 77, Chester-square. The ancient see of Rochester, of which his Lordship was the sixty-ninth Bishop, was founded in the reign of St. Edward the Confessor. Its first Bishop, in 1058, was Seward, the Saxon Abbot of Abingdon, whose immediate successors were two Norman monks of Bec. Among the celebrated prelates of the see were Dr. Fisher, Dr. Ridley, Dr. Neale, and Dr. Atterbury. The almost immediate predecessor of Dr. Murray (Dr. Percy, Bishop of Carlisle, holding the see but for a few months between them) was Dr. Walker King, who was the friend and executor of Edmund Burke, and whose son, the respected Archdeacon of Rochester, died recently, and an account was given of him in this Journal.

SIR HENRY FAIRFAX, BART.

Colonel Sir Henry Fairfax, Bart., who died in Edinburgh, his birthplace, on the 3rd ult., which was his seventieth birthday, was a scion of the famous baronial family of Fairfax, and was the only surviving son of Vice-Admiral Sir William Fairfax, by his wife, Margaret, daughter of Samuel Charters, Esq., Solicitor of Customs for Scotland. Henry Fairfax entered the British Army in 1808, at the age of eighteen, when he was presented by the Duke of York with a commission. He served with the old 95th (the Rifle Brigade) in the Peninsula, joining just two days after the battle of Salamanca. He was present with his distinguished corps at the retreat from Madrid, the affair of San Munos, and other minor engagements. In consequence of ill health he was compelled to return to England, and was promoted to a company in the 85th Light Infantry, without purchase. He remained with this regiment till he finished his military career. On becoming a Colonel, in 1841, he retired from the Army, after a service of upwards of thirty years. He married, first, in January, 1830, Archibald Montgomerie, third daughter of Thomas Williamson Ramsay, Esq., of Lixmount and Maxton, which lady died on the 13th of July, 1844; he married, secondly, on the 19th of December, 1851, Sarah, eldest daughter of the late William Astell, Esq., M.P. for Bedfordshire, many years a director of the East India Company. Sir Henry Fairfax obtained his baronetcy by creation, in 1836, as a further recognition of the distinguished services of his gallant father, Vice-Admiral Fairfax, when Flag Captain to Admiral Duncan at the battle of Camperdown. Sir Henry leaves issue (by his first marriage only) three sons and one daughter—viz., William, his successor; Thomas Edward, in H.M. Bengal Civil Service; Henry, a Lieutenant in the Royal Navy; and Elizabeth Mary Somerville. The deceased Baronet's only sister, Mary, widow of Captain Samuel Grey and wife of William Somerville, is the celebrated Mrs. Somerville, author of the "Connection of the Physical Sciences," "Physical Geography," and other popular works. Sir Henry Fairfax is succeeded by his eldest son, now Sir William George Herbert Taylor Fairfax, the second Baronet, who was born in 1831, was distinguished in the Crimea, and is a Captain in the 15th Foot.

SIR J. H. TURING, BART.

Sir James Henry Turing, Baronet, of Foveran, in the county of Aberdeen, who died at Rotterdam on the 13th ult., was the representative of a very ancient family, which dates its settlement in the barony of Foveran in the thirteenth century, and was distinguished for loyalty to the Crown. The family was closely connected with the Gordons of Haddo and of Gicht, and with the house of Huntley; and Sir John Turing, the first Baronet, so created in 1638, raised a troop of cavalry at his own cost in behalf of the King, and lost his son at the battle of Worcester, where he himself also fought. Sir James Henry Turing, the Baronet just deceased, was son of John Turing, Esq., by his wife, Margaret, daughter of Smart Tennant, Esq., of Musselburgh, N.B., and was born on the 10th of December, 1791. He succeeded his relative Sir Robert Turing in the baronetcy in 1831. He for many years, till his death, held the British Consulate for the Hague and its dependencies, and resided at Rotterdam, where his funeral was attended by the Consuls and Vice-Consuls of all the nations, and by a large circle of private friends, with every demonstration of respect. Sir James married, the 20th of September, 1821, Antoinette, second daughter of Sir Alexander Ferrier, K.H., and has had four sons, and nine daughters: three of the latter are married—viz., Mrs. Henry Mackenzie, Mrs. John Peter, of Kirkland, and Mrs. Adrian Moens, of Rotterdam. Sir James is succeeded by his eldest son, now Sir Robert Fraser Turing, Baronet, who was born in 1827, and married, in 1853, Catherine Georgiana, second daughter of Walter S. Davidson, Esq., of Lowndes-square, London.

HENRY DRUMMOND, ESQ., M.P.

Henry Drummond, Esq., of Albury Park, Surrey, F.R.S., J.P., and M.P. for West Surrey, whose death took place at his seat, Albury Park, on the 19th ult., was the eldest son of Henry Drummond, Esq., of the Grange, Hants, and of Charing-cross, the eminent banker, by his wife, Anne, daughter of Henry, first Viscount Melville. He was born on the 5th of December, 1786, and was educated at Harrow, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he founded the professorship of Political Economy. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society, and a member of the Royal Academy of Fine Arts at Florence, and has represented West Surrey in Parliament since 1847. He married Lady Henrietta Hay, eldest daughter of Robert Auriol, ninth Earl of Kinnoul, by which lady, who died on the 7th of March, 1854, he had three sons, who all died young, and two daughters—Louisa, married, the 26th of May, 1845, to Lord Lovaine, M.P., eldest son of the Earl of Beverley; and Adelaide, married, on the 16th of September, 1850, to Sir Thomas Rokewode Gage, Bart. In politics Mr. Drummond was essentially a Tory, and retained to the last the principles he had early imbibed from Mr. Pitt and Lord Melville. No speaker in the House could boast of a more attentive audience, which he owed not less to the real respect in which he was held by politicians of every shade of opinion than to his high principle, as well as to the quaint wit by which his speeches were distinguished. He wrote numerous essays upon religious, political, and general subjects, and he was successful as a pamphleteer. He was a man of much benevolence and kindness of disposition, and was endeared to a widely-extended circle of friends and dependents. In religious matters he was well known as one of the leaders in the Anglo-Catholic movement, and he devoted large sums to the erection of handsome churches of that persuasion, such as those at Albury and in Gordon-square. Mr. Drummond could boast of Royal as well as noble descent. His great-grandfather, William Drummond, fourth Viscount Strathallan, married Margaret, eldest daughter of Lord William Murray, fourth son of John, first Marquis of Atholl, by his wife, Amelia Stanley, daughter of James, seventh Earl of Derby, whose grandfather, Henry Stanley, fourth Earl married Lady Margaret Clifford, only child of Henry, Earl of Cumberland; and his wife, Lady Eleanor Brandon, second daughter and coheir of Charles, Duke of Suffolk, and Princess Mary Tudor (Queen Dowager of France), daughter of King Henry VII. and Elizabeth of York, the heiress of the Plantaganets. It is worthy of remark that, although the marriage of Charles Brandon (the Suffolk in Shakspeare's "King Henry VIII.") with Mary Tudor was, according to popular notion, "cloth of frieze matched with cloth of gold," he was really descended from the Plantaganets, his grandfather, Sir William Brandon, having married Elizabeth Wingfield, maternally descended from Humphrey de Bohun and his wife, the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of King Edward I. Elizabeth Wingfield's mother was Elizabeth Goushill, and it is interesting to note that her sister Jane (they being daughters and coheirs of Sir Robert Goushill and Elizabeth Fitzalan, whose mother was a De Bohun) became the mother of Thomas Stanley, the first Earl of Derby (stepfather to Henry VII.), and therefore Lady Amelia Stanley, wife of the first Marquis of Atholl, was descended from these two sisters.

DR. THOMAS FORSTER.

Dr. Thomas Forster, who lately died at Brussels, was a man of literary and scientific acquirements. He took his degree in medicine at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in the year 1814, but never practised, being in possession of an ample fortune. He devoted most of his time to scientific pursuits. He was an able linguist, and spoke with accuracy seven languages. He was the author of many works on natural history, astronomy, and meteorology. He was on terms of intimacy with Lord Byron, Shelley, and, in after life, with Sir William Herschel, and his son, the present Sir John; also, the celebrated phrenologists Drs. Spurzheim and Gall. For a period of nearly thirty years Dr. Forster principally resided in Belgium, during which time his house was the rendezvous of all the literary and scientific men visiting or residing in that kingdom. The doctor was related to the celebrated John Locke; and he, in 1828, published, with the assistance of Lord King, a volume of letters of his illustrious relative, the manuscripts of which are now in the possession of his wife. In February, 1817, he married Julia, third daughter of Colonel Mark Beaufoy, of Bushey, in Hertfordshire, by whom he had one daughter.

THE HON. MRS. NOEL.

The death of the Hon. Mrs. Noel took place on the 27th of January, at Moxhull Park, her seat, in Warwickshire. She was the only daughter of Ralph Adderley, Esq., of Elmley Castle, Worcestershire, and Coton Hall, Staffordshire, and aunt of the Right Hon. Charles Bowyer Adderley, M.P., of Hams Hall, Warwick, and Norton, Staffordshire. She was married, first, to the late Andrew Halket, Esq., of Moxhull Park, Warwickshire; and, secondly, in 1820, to the Hon. Berkeley Noel, who died in 1841, and who was son of Sir Gerard Noel Noel, Bart, M.P., and his wife, Diana, Baroness Barham, of Barham Court, and Teston, in the county of Kent, and brother of the present Charles Noel, Earl of Gainsborough, of Exton Park, in the county of Rutland. Mrs. Noel is succeeded in her estates by her only son (by her second marriage), Berkeley-Plantagenet-Guilford-Charles Noel, Esq., of Moxhull Park, Warwickshire.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

It is announced that the re-erection of a fort at the mouth of the harbour of Great Yarmouth is to be proceeded with.

Mr. E. Bernays, of Woolwich Dockyard, has been appointed to the office of civil engineer of works at Pembroke Dockyard.

On Thursday week the Channel Fleet, consisting of the Royal Albert, Edgar, Donegal, Algiers, Trafalgar, Queen, Mersey, Melpomene, and Diadem, left Portland under sail for Lisbon.

General Sir George Brown, G.C.B., is appointed to the command of the forces in Ireland, in succession to General Lord Seaton, G.C.B., whose period of service (five years) expires on the 12th proximo.

The Inspector-General of Fortifications Department and the Barrack Department, so long resident at Harrington House, Whitehall-gardens, have removed to the War Office in Pall-mall.

The Secretary of State for War, with the concurrence of the General Commanding-in-Chief, has decided that the Army shall be equipped exclusively with those rifled muskets, pattern 1858, the parts of which are universal, or respectively interchangeable, and that the arms which are non-interchangeable shall be kept for the militia, volunteers, and other forces.

A number of beautifully-executed maps, plates, and plans of the various incidents connected with the Crimean campaign have been presented to the non-commissioned officers' library at the Royal Engineer establishment, Chatham, by the Government, the sieges and the whole of the operations in which the British forces were engaged being faithfully depicted. The library is also enriched by other presents which have been made by the War Office authorities.

The Cameleon screw-corvette was launched on Thursday week at Deptford. The following are her dimensions:—Length between perpendiculars, 185 feet; length of keel for tonnage, 164 feet; breadth, extreme, 33 feet 2 inches; ditto, for tonnage, 32 feet; moulded, 32 feet 4 inches; depth in hold, 17 feet 5 inches. Her burden, in tons, is 950 8-94; and her engines are of 200-horse power. She is to be mounted with seventeen guns.

Lowering Ships' Boats.—An interesting series of trials took place, last Saturday, at Woolwich, by order of the Lords of the Admiralty, and in the presence of representatives of the Peninsular and Oriental and other steam-ship companies, for the purpose of testing the merits of a new mode of lowering boats, the invention of Messrs. Wood and Rogers. The experiments were very successful, and fully tested the advantages of the lowering, suspending, and hoisting apparatus. A boat was detached from a steam-tug at full speed, a life-buoy was thrown overboard, the boat manned, and the buoy picked up in forty-five seconds; the boat once more brought alongside the tug to the davits in three minutes. A number of other trials of a similar character were made with the same satisfactory results.

Royal Volunteer Ball.—The preparations for this magnificent fête (to be held on the 7th inst.) are rapidly progressing, and the new Floral Hall bids fair to be the great focus of attraction for some days to come. The list of ladies patronesses now includes the names of more than fifty of the highest members of the aristocracy. A special gallery for their exclusive accommodation is in process of construction at the east end of the hall, from the design of Mr. Charles Barry, and from this elevation a grand view of the ball will be obtained. Messrs. Gunter will supply refreshments during the evening at counters arranged in convenient situations around the ballroom; and the supper, by Messrs. Staples, of Aldersgate-street, will be served in the basement under the hall—a gigantic apartment seventeen feet in height, and extending beneath the whole area of the building. It is rumoured that it is not unlikely her Majesty may honour the ball with a visit; and the presence of the Prince of Wales and Prince Alfred is understood to be placed beyond a doubt.

Government Inspection of the Edinburgh Volunteers.—Major Nelson, one of her Majesty's Inspectors of Volunteer Regiments, held an official inspection last Saturday of the city volunteers in the Queen's Park. The weather was fair, but the ground, from the effects of the recent thaw, was by no means in a favourable condition to the turn out. However, there were 750 rank and file under arms in the park at three o'clock, and, with officers, commissioned and non-commissioned, the number present would at least be 850. The companies were each minutely inspected by Major Nelson, the men being put through all the ordinary exercises. When marshalled in line the rank and file extended to nearly a quarter of a mile. The result of the inspection, which was witnessed by a large number of spectators assembled in the park and on the heights, was, we understand, very satisfactory to the commanding officers. We give, at page 208 of this week's Number, an Engraving of the Edinburgh Rifle Corps Field Day, from a sketch by Mr. Harry T. Morgan.——The various city volunteer companies were drawn up at Waverley-bridge and along Princes-street yesterday week to do honour to the 78th Highlanders, which gallant regiment (renowned for its heroic services in the relief of Lucknow, and not unjustly termed the saviours of India) arrived in Edinburgh on that day, and were received with all the honours which a hurried preparation enabled the citizens to accord.

Commissions in the Cavalry.—The following general order has been issued from the Horse Guards:—"His Royal Highness the General Commanding-in-Chief, having had under consideration the present expenses necessarily incurred by officers of cavalry, and anxious to reduce them as far as practicable, has the satisfaction of announcing to the Army that her Majesty the Queen has been pleased to approve of a reduction of the regulation-prices for commission in the cavalry of the line, which will accordingly for the future be as follows—viz.:—

Lieutenant-Colonel	£4500	instead of	£6175
Major	3200	,,	4575
Captain	1800	,,	3225
Lieutenant	700	,,	1190
Cornet	450	,,	840

The difference in value between the late and proposed regulation-price of a cavalry commission will be paid to the retiring officer from the reserve fund at the disposal of the Secretary of State for War. The price which an officer will pay on promotion by purchase to the higher ranks will be:—

Major to be Lieutenant-Colonel	£1300	instead of	£1600
Captain to be Major	1400	,,	1850
Lieutenant to be Captain	1100	,,	2035
Cornet to be Lieutenant	250	,,	350

His Royal Highness also promulgates, in concurrence with the Secretary of State for War, revised regulations regarding the purchase of officers' chargers from the ranks. Every officer of cavalry and horse artillery and of the Cape Mounted Riflemen below the rank of regimental field officer is permitted to select two horses as chargers from the ranks, with the exception of medical officers, veterinary surgeons, paymasters, and quartermasters, who may select one each, under certain specified conditions."

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THE main feature of the Parliamentary week really seems to have been the development of the organisation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There was, after the rushing debate on the first phase of the Budget, a tendency to dulness, which culminated on the last night of the general discussion, and which "would have become chronic in the talk in Committee but for the extraordinary nervous energy exhibited by Mr. Gladstone. He seems to have made up his mind that he should anticipate the necessity for defence by the boldest attack. He has not permitted the victory which he gained to have its demoralising effect upon his opponents, but, by the eagerness with which he has plunged into the midst of his discomfited foes and had about him the sound a spirit which has induced many a man, and perhaps a whole party, to turn and stand at bay when if they had been let alone, they would probably, for a time at least, have been comparatively quiescent. It is no fiction to say that in the Committee on Customs Mr. Gladstone speaks at the conclusion of ever so few remarks of a very peculiar manner her who ventures to address the House; and he—to use a coarse but expressive phrase—so props them that they acquire an artificial courage, and his cue, when they recollect it, is generally nourished their fists in the air. A most notable specimen of this very successful tactics on Mr. Gladstone's part was observable in the discussion on the duty on "corks" on Tuesday night, when, by his insatiable and unappeasable combativeness—his everlasting challenging at his opponents—he was enabled to meet every calibre—he roused a tumult which rung loud and furious through the House, and which was only surpassed in the historical circumstance of Lord Palmerston and Mr. Laing holding the Chancellor of the Exchequer by his coat-tails to restrain, from his physical powers, when engaged in a great work, are something wonderful. On this very occasion, at a quarter past twelve o'clock, he, without the smallest appearance of having exerted himself further than moving that the Speaker do leave the chair, rejected the conciliatory offer of Mr. E. Ball, who, if it was meant really and and a good thing and said it well, when he suggested that the House should give the Chancellor of the Exchequer a vote of confidence in him on his legs, a little rest, by adjourning the discussion for the present. To all appearance Mr. Gladstone could have gone on for hours more energetically (we use the word to express himself it is hardly possible to describe) in every hour till the time for proceedings should have run out; but evidently he had a great view in which this terrible sensations and impatience of criticism should be looked at, and that is in its effect on the ultimate issue of all the talk and the hasting scheme. It is more than conjectured that a great deal has been already done to part important parts of it by this characteristic of the management of the conversation in the House.

Certainly, if Mr. Gladstone's impatience was fitly exercised, it was on the occasion of the last night's debate on Mr. Du Cane's motion. Nothing could have languished more wretchedly than that whole discussion. Mr. Bernal Osborne and Mr. Hubbard, by some means or other, made an excellent maiden speech; that Sir F. Baring contrived to stretch his party line he took in ordinary and regular talk into an opposition which the universal expression of belief that he would vote in direct contradiction to his speech probably induced him to do; by being late the general mass followed Mr. Disraeli into the lobby; that Mr. Bright for a brief hour roused the waning debate into life by a fine intellectual effort, in which he "slated" Lowe and moulded the vexed ears of Saxon men and members; that Mr. Bernal Osborne was unusually subdued, while he was at other times considerably less coarse than ordinary. Nevertheless, a heavy cloud hung over the whole business, and when Mr. Milner Gibson rose to make his first great speech as a Cabinet Minister he was received with cold audience, which was like champagne, the effervescence of which has subsided, and only fizzes a little when the cork is drawn with a pop, but a place or bread. The President of the Board of Trade has to struggle not only with that hesitation which seems to have come over time considerably less coarse than ordinary. Nevertheless, a heavy cloud hung over the whole business, and when Mr. Milner Gibson rose to make his first great speech as a Cabinet Minister he was received with a cold audience, which was like champagne, the effervescence of which has subsided, and only fizzes a little when the cork is drawn with a pop, but a place or bread. The President of the Board of Trade has to struggle not only with that hesitation which seems to have come over the House generally, but with the unfavourable impression which his speech produced when he was a private member. He has, with a ready effort, to undo the mischief he then did, and to undo it under the disadvantage of cough and sheum. On the whole, however, he did his work well, although his great point about the "carcase and underwear" sent forward failed, because the word "coriander" lengthened the phrase out too much, and caused the sentence to assume a too elaborately oratorical shape. The frankly cheers of Mr. Bright were observable to superfluity, and rather seemed to embarrass than encourage Mr. Milner Gibson. Mr. Radical though he is, is a bit of a fine gentleman, and may not see the force of this somewhat demonstrative petting of the representative of the working men in the Cabinet.

At this time it was generally believed, judging from the tone of the debate and the speech of the House, that the Budget would go over to Monday; nor was the expectation diminished by the opposition of Mr. Walpole, who, more watery than ever, made a terrible mess of it, by making over a mass of figures which somebody had given him, and which he had not taken the trouble to master, giving millions of shillings, and altogether suggesting what his future struggles with the multiplication table must have been. It was quite time to think a business which had begun to bore, and therefore it was that Mr. Gladstone, sacrificing his desire to reply to Mr. Disraeli, intervened; and the order was given "to sit up" for a long night's work. This was the most successful of Mr. Gladstone's recent efforts; he was evidently in a state of the intelligent excitement; and the House was kept in a kept pricking him in his most sensitive places, and really contrived to be in a humour when once that had been accomplished at, and not with, him. All this time Mr. Disraeli was making most ostentatious notes in large text on separate sheets of notepaper, which he placed on the box before him, and which suggested a failure, for nothing is more fatal to detaining proper than notetaking. It was a very part of the game, and they were enough and frightened enough, although he had not the fear of a Gladstonian reply before him; but, as if his evil genius would not be unseful of Mr. Gladstone's recent efforts; he was evidently in a state of the intelligent excitement; and the House was kept in a kept pricking him in his most sensitive places, and really contrived to be in a humour when once that had been accomplished at, and not with, him. All this time Mr. Disraeli was making most ostentatious notes in large text on separate sheets of notepaper, which he placed on the box before him, and which suggested a failure, for nothing is more fatal to detaining proper than notetaking. It was a very part of the game, and they were enough and frightened enough, although he had not the fear of a Gladstonian reply before him; but, as if his evil genius would not be unseful to be pronounced, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, instead of listening with that contemptuous indifference to Mr. Disraeli's speeches which he so often found to be the best line to pursue for that gentleman's oratorical efforts, eagerly watched every word, and accompanied his remarks with such a running commentary that the House signified its disapprobation, and gave opportunity to Mr. Disraeli to retort that, however fitted in other respects for Gladstone might be for the leadership of that assembly, of all impulsiveness of temperament and want of self-command would seriously interfere with the management of that object of his ambition—a taunt which the Opposition has received as a hint, on which they have acted ever since, and they succeeded in making all their hopes of opposition to the Budget turn on their regularity of "ruling" its inventor. In short, by sheer fidgetiness, Mr. Gladstone gave Mr. Disraeli courage, and enabled him to make an excellent and even powerful demonstration in the face of the Conservative division which was impending, and on the support of Ministers, astonished even themselves, and on the approach of which Sir E. Cairns, evincing a generosity unusual in a leader, intency which is melancholy in Mr. Disraeli's immediate standing counsel, sprang, winning a race for the door from Lord Stanley (who also attended himself), only because the noble Lord was engaged in an obscure and remote place in the gallery, and Lord Derby's Solicitor-General, with more confidence, sat out the debate until the last moment in his accustomed seat near the table.

On Tuesday the brief (in point of time) debate on the question of the annexation of Savoy to France was remarkable for the high tone of the speaking, in its strict sense. Mr. Kinglake ("Eothen" Kinglake, be it observed, by the way, is the name of a new member in the House) is a weak-looking gentleman, and he had on this occasion to refer to his want of physical strength, which was more apparent than usual. He has never exhibited any of the qualities which go to make up a House of Commons' success; and probably he is aware that such a thing is not easily attainable to any one who has not a certain number of inches round the chest. But in this instance, despite all his defects of manner and a sort of coldness which is not redeemed by the smallest vestige of glitter, he made a polished speech, and one which bristled with significance. In seconding the motion, Sir Robert Peel vindicated his right to be heard in the House of Commons in another character than that of a farceur. It is not too much to say that his speech was characterised by an argumentative power which was not lost in the earnest, impassioned, and impressive oratory which was addressed to it. The interest and audience of the House was as genuine as it was universal, and it is quite certain that he has displayed powers, probably, to be used on an occasion on the volunteer question to be forgotten. Altogether, there was something in the spirit which he breathed into the discussion which animated Lord John Russell into a peroration which was as nearly eloquence as possible.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

BISHOPRICK-HOUSE.—Lord BROUGHAM called attention to the sufferings of women and children employed in the process of bleaching and dyeing in different parts of the country. Earl GRANVILLE was understood to say that the Government would direct an inquiry into the subject.

ROYAL BURGHS' BILL.—The Lord CHANCELLOR, in ruling attention to the subject of naval reserves, alluded at some length to the recommendations of the Royal Commission upon the subject, and expressed his hope that so little had been done to secure for the country an efficient reserve.—The Earl of DERBY replied that in reality the Admiralty had adopted measures for obtaining a supply of men and boys for the Navy by means of training ships, and by enlarging the number of coast volunteers, which at present between 11,000 and 12,000 men; that was to say, 5000 for the Coast Guard, and about 7000 for the Naval Coast Volunteers. Lord DE REDESDALE was not inclined to place much confidence in this reserve, and thought parts of the evidence given by Admiral Seymour Fanshawe not then dropped.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE SERPENTINE.—Mr. W. COWPER gave notice of a motion for a Select Committee to inquire into the best means of effectually cleansing the Serpentine.

SUGAR BOUNTIES.—In reply to Mr. Bentinck, Lord J. RUSSELL said he had sent through the Foreign Office the Report of the Committee which had been finally adopted, to instruct Mr. Buchanan to urge upon the Government of Berlin the necessity of making such arrangements with this Report as would be made by France in favour of the trade and commerce of England.

CRIMEA.—Lord DUNKELLIN, in answering a question from Mr. Pakington, said he had received the despatches from China which he expected, but that they did not contain any information of importance. He could not announce he could not say what time he could make a statement to the House in regard to the proposed reduction of the military force in the Crimea.

BIRD AND NEST LICENCES.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply to Sir C. Lemon, said the question was under consideration, but no decision had been taken out for anything but wine. No change was proposed with reference to licences for game.

THE SEVENTH ARTICLE OF THE TREATY.—Lord J. RUSSELL, in reply to Mr. Hennessy, said the Government had made a representation that it was strong sense was shown not to agree to the 11th article of the Treaty by the Government of Denmark, which was to the effect that munication her Majesty's Government had given a very positive answer that her Government wished now to make any alteration in the 11th article of the treaty.

CUSTOMS ACTS.

THE House then went into Committee on the Customs Acts, when THE CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved a resolution with reference to the wine duties, and moved a resolution to the effect that, until the 31st of March, 1865, the duties on Sherry and Madeira be 5s. 6d. per gallon. The right hon. gentleman gave reasons for postponing until the 1st of March, 1865, the proposed reduction of the duties on light table wines, and mentioned the vexed ears of Saxon men and members; that Mr. Bernal Osborne was unusually subdued, while he was at other times considerably less coarse than ordinary. Nevertheless, a heavy cloud hung over the whole business, and when Mr. Milner Gibson rose to make his first great speech as a Cabinet Minister he was received with a cold audience, which was like champagne, the effervescence of which has subsided, and only fizzes a little when the cork is drawn with a pop, but a place or bread. stabulary had proved itself to be a most valuable force, and that its reduction would be a serious injury to the country. The real cause of the ingenuity for crime was the unwillingness of persons to come forward and give evidence.—The Marquis of LONDONDERRY expressed his regret that the force was not under the control of the local magistracy. The real difficulty lay in the reluctance of the people to co-operate in the conviction of offenders.—After some observations from the Marquis of WORCESTER, the Duke of NEWCASTLE denied that crime was on the increase in Ireland. The constabulary took their orders from their officers, and the officers from the local magistracy.

EMIGRATION TREATY.—Lord HARRIS asked whether a treaty had been signed authorising the French Government to appoint emigration agents in India for the purpose of introducing a supply of agricultural labourers.—Lord WODEHOUSE replied that the treaty was not yet signed, but was under the consideration of the Foreign and Indian Departments. The treaty, when would be taken to protect the emigrants.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Bankruptcy Administration Bill (India) was read a second time; the Court of Chancery Bill was read a third time, and passed. The Bankruptcy (1860) Bill, with various amendments, was passed through Committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

COLLECTION OF TAXES.—In reply to a question from Mr. T. DARCOMBE, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that there was no intention to propose a measure for the more effectual recovery hereafter of the arrears of the Queen's taxes to Government officers; but that, as in some parts of the country a desire had been felt to transfer those duties, it was proposed in the course of the present Session, to introduce a bill to permit the voluntary transfer in cases where the parties desired it.

SAVOY AND NICE.

Mr. KINGLAKE then proceeded to move for copies of the correspondence which had taken place between her Majesty's Government and the Governments of the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia, in respect to the proposal for annexing Savoy and Nice to the empire of France. The hon. gentleman said that he moved for these papers in the close and friendly relations existed between France and Sardinia, observed that in the autumn of last year he received a short but confidential letter from Paris, in which he stated that Savoy and Nice were to be annexed to France by universal suffrage. That letter expressed a hope that the impression that those provinces were to be severed from Sardinia became so general that the subjects of the King of Sardinia in Nice and Savoy might, on the 1st of April, lawfully assert the undiluted loyalty with which they clung to the ancient house of Savoy. How solemn was that phrase for the ancient dominion of Savoy originate? We all knew that France undertook the war against Austria with the solemn declaration that she disclaimed all thoughts of dismemberment, and that she drew the sword to free Italy, and not to extend the limits of France. In the month of September, however, a month appeared in which he would not mention, but which he pledged his honour to be worthy of credit—that the Treaty of Turin, which had been signed in March with the Princess Clotilda a document was signed, not in the nature of a treaty, but of a declaration of policy, by which she ceded to France the French promised aid, offensive and defensive, to Sardinia; and the King of Sardinia, on his side, undertook to cede to France Savoy and Nice whenever possession he might obtain in Central Italy. He (Mr. Kinglake) believed that the Government of Sardinia was entitled to his full confidence, and thoughtful in his procedure; but it should be remembered that the power with which he was dealing was one which was not likely to be able to control. If Nice and Savoy were annexed to France, it would be the first instance of territorial aggrandisement which had ever been made in Europe that the time has arrived when nations must depend, not upon the justice of their cause, but upon the power of their arms.

Sir R. PEEL seconded the motion, and contended that the question of the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France affected the whole country of European nations, and the charter of tenures which formed the base of existing territorial arrangements. The hon. gentleman then read various private letters which he had received from Savoy protesting against the proposed annexation, and declaring that no alteration were to be made, the inhabitants of Nice and Savoy desired to be annexed to the Republic of Switzerland. He called upon the House to look at the whole question, not to disregard national feeling on this subject, nor to quench the eye of liberty by the hand of power. Whatever might be the policy of the principles entitled as one of the great Powers of Europe, show that England was determined to respect the independence of Italy, and to oppose a policy of aggrandisement which, if not checked, might prove fatal not only to the independence of Italy, but to that of Europe. He was not hostile, but might also seriously compromise the peace of Europe. If her Majesty's Government would allow the House to see the papers, they would have the gratitude of the friends of civil and religious liberty all over the world.

Mr. CROWDER expressed his opinion that the declaration that would fall, if extremely difficult to carry it out. At the same time he was bound to say that he had no reason to suppose that the Government had failed in the discharge of duties.

In reply to Sir S. Northcote, with regard to the Treasury minutes of 1848 and 1853,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that the latter were explanatory of the former.

Mr. HENNESSY objected to the resolution, on the ground that it would not only reduce a source of revenue, but remove burdens from the upper and leave. Against this description of exceptional and unjust legislation he protested.

A desultory conversation ensued, in the course of which a point was raised as to the construction which should be put upon the resolution.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER deprecated the course adopted of introducing amendments after the resolution had been put from the chair. With regard to the importation of beer into France, that subject, although not immediately connected with the resolution, had been incidentally performed a portion of the negotiation. If the Government had endeavoured to secure a favourable reduction of the duties, according to the circumstances, it was good on the one side with what was good on the other, and what he hoped to be derived from the treaty would not be gained by the duty imposed by the country. He had always contended that the duty imposed by the country should be as low as possible, and especially with those articles which were the food of the people. The latter should be considered the finest, a higher duty than was charged in France upon English beer.

Mr. DILLWYN, in reply to Mr. Hennessy, said he was signed upon the ministers, and called upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, before he withdrew the resolution, to state what was the amount of the loss which he held that the whole Budget was an abomination, utterly unworthy of a statesmanlike mind, and a skilful financier.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON, by way of amendment to the resolution, wished to the effect that the duties on Sherry and Madeira should be 5s. per gallon, and which it could be proved, to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, that the wine had paid only 4s. per gallon prior before the 10th of February instant.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER resisted the motion, contending that those wine-merchants only who had complied with the Treasury minute of 1848 could receive the drawback. Otherwise, it carried, would involve a loss upon the public of something like £200,000.

The amendment was then negatived by 201 to 73.

The first portion of the resolution, fixing the duty at 5s. per gallon, was then agreed to.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER then moved the second portion of the resolution, to the effect that the duty on Sherry and Madeira be 5s. 6d. per gallon should come in force on the 1st of January, 1865, instead of the 1st of April; and that the duty of 1s. should be payable upon wine containing eighteen, and not fifteen, degrees of alcoholic spirit.

Mr. STAVELEY HILL protested against the effect of the amendment would be to give a direct advantage to the wines of France as against those of Portugal.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER denied the accuracy of the representation of the hon. and learned gentleman, and contended that it would give a large measure or advantage to the wines of Germany and not to those of France, many of which were now charged with a heavier duty imported into this country, and would consequently come in under the 2s. scale.

The resolution was then agreed to.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER next proposed to postpone the resolution No. 5, affecting the duties on light table wines, until the 1st of March, and that the following schedule of the various articles to be made free of duty under the Customs Act.

Mr. NEWDEGATE protested against proceeding, at ten minutes to midnight, with a resolution which so declared affected the interests of nearly a million of the artisan classes in the country.

The Chairman then reported progress.

The House resumed, and the resolution was reported.

CRIMINAL OUTRAGES IN IRELAND.—The Marquis of CLANRICARDE, in moving for certain returns, called attention to the impunity attending crime in Ireland, which was all the more extraordinary in the present improved state of society in that country. In the course of his speech the noble Marquis made some strong animadversions upon the inefficiency of the constabulary for the protection of life and property.—The Duke of SOMERSET, in assenting to the motion, contended that the Irish con-

CHESS.

A Member of the Deptford Club; R. A. Nesbitt; C. W., of Sunbury; L. F. G. They shall have due attention.

J. C. W.—A King cannot capture a defended piece under any circumstances.

Mr. Thomas (Ryde).—It was not overlooked; but White appears to have thought, whatever his letter may say, that he still had the better of the battle.

T. Tolfree.—Your solution of Problem No. 834 is a perfect problem. In the case of 1. Kt to B 7th, &c., the Stalemate does not hit the mark.

E. D. D., Aswell, Herts.—See notice above, relative to Problem No. 832, to "M. D. P." Mate cannot possibly be given in the manner proposed.

R. B. B.—The position in four moves is wrong; that in five very good.

Alpha.—Your solution of Problem No. 834 is correct in the main, but we give the commoner route. No. 1 is also good, but not so effective: No. 1 has no White King on the board; No. 9 checks of two solutions; No. 4 is erroneously copied, the White Queen's Bishop's Pawn not having vacated on the diagonal.

T. H., North London.—Promising, but too easy.

J. Hunt.—Your solution is right; please report next week.

J. G.—The following is the very simplest ineffective way in which Rook is given in the Scotch Chess Code:—"When a player joins the ranks of his King's or Queen's Book, he must not afterwards move his Knight's Pawn." Another is, "A Rook shall not, on the score of the Book, unless before commencing the game or match, be adjudged to have the privilege of Castling."

R. H. N., of Reading.—Mr. Staunton says true; the "Kt, Kt" Gambit is strongly backed by Kt to K B 3rd. In the second variation of the solution we gave, for "2. Q to K 5th," read "2. P to Q 4th."

W. T. Pierce; H. A. B.; C. W., of Sunbury; T. F.; J. R.—They shall be examined.

W. Wright.—The two-move variation was not overlooked; but we have not been favoured with your solution.

Surveyor.—The tourney at the London Chess Club is not finished. Why, unless from the difficulty of bringing the combatants to do battle, we don't understand.

F. W.; J. G.—Every diagram should have the signature of the composer on the top. It is of no consequence whether it is printed or written.

G. M.—In this country there is no player, English or foreign, of the first class at present in London.

G. W.—Much depends upon what Problems are to be selected. See Rule XIV., on "The Governing Fifty Moves," in the Revised Code of Chess Laws, "Bernstein's Chess Freak."

J. Hunt.—Your solution of Problem No. 834 is right; but in No. 832 the second variation there was unfortunately: 1. Kt to Q 6th, 2. Kt to B 5th, 3. Kt to K 3rd, 4. Kt to Q 5th, mate. We gratefully, thereabouts, mate, and then, move as Black might, the White forces have the game in hand.

I. C., Calcutta.—Received with great pleasure and interest. A reply shall be forwarded very shortly.

THE IMPERIAL STABLES AT THE NEW LOUVRE.

The Imperial Stables at the new Louvre have been recently completed, and are now occupied by the Emperor Napoleon's numerous stud, consisting of thoroughbreds, hunters, chargers, and postinghorses. The entrance to the stables is by the Place du Carrousel on the one side, and by the Quai du Louvre on the other. They are in the form of a long square, divided by the so-called courtyards of Caulaincourt and Viscenti, the entrance to the latter of which looks upon the Seine. The first-named, which is in the Caulaincourt courtyard, is divided into fourteen stalls for saddle-horses. This is the part shown in our drawing. The stalls have been constructed with fine oak, the racks are of bronze, and the floorings of brown marble. The walls are covered with light yellow stucco, as brilliant as the most highly-polished marble. The water required on the spot for different purposes is brought into each stall by means of pipes, which are provided with elegant taps. The general cleaning of the horses is performed in a space set apart for the purpose, and called the "Manège." In order that these horses were gratified with a sight of the celebrated charger Bucéphalus, which has been presented to the Emperor of Morocco, and of the beautiful Ajaxe, which bore his Majesty safely through the dangers of Solferino. One of the galleries, which comes immediately after the lavoir, is upwards of a hundred feet in length, and fifteen yards wide. Eighty-two horses, arranged in a double row, are most comfortably housed in this gallery; each horse having a special stall. The ground floor of the two other sides of the parallelogram is occupied by the coachhouses, saddlery departments, a forge, workshops, &c. The Emperor's private carriages, of which a large number are in use, the coachhouses one hundred and eighty vehicles of various descriptions. The entire establishment is under the immediate surveillance and direction of General Fleury.

It may be remarked that these stables are exclusively occupied by the equine servitors of Napoleon III. The Ecuries de l'Impératrice, in the Rue de Montaigne, are still preserved for the horses belonging specially to the Empress. The Ecuries de Versailles are also attendants at the stables of the new Louvre are English, whose superior knowledge of matters of horse management is generally much appreciated in France.

The Channel Islands submarine cable is again broken near Jersey; but a cable has been successfully laid down between Granville and Jersey, so that telegrams will shortly reach that island from England via France.

THE WINE DUTIES.—On Monday night the House of Commons, in Committee of the whole House on the Customs Acts, passed the resolution of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was thereupon reported to the House. From that date a sliding scale of duties ceased, and the new one is now in full operation. Until the 1st of January next, therefore, there will be a uniform duty of 1s. 3d. upon wines of every kind imported into this country; and after that date a graduated scale of duties ranging from 1s. per gallon upon wines containing less than 15 degrees of proof spirit, 1s. 6d. if less than 20 degrees, and 3s. if less than 40 degrees.

THE EGG TRADE.—The following statistics relating to the egg trade, taken from Galignani's Messenger, are drawn from official sources. In 1815 the number of eggs imported into France was 1,200,000; in 1816 it rose to 8,039,000. Six years later—in 1822—the number was 33,000,000, and 91,000,000 in 1830. In 1847 the number reached to 55,000,000, and then gradually increased until 1848, when it was 88,500,000, for which an export duty of 11,062, was paid. From 1848 to 1851, there was a falling off. The yearly consumption of eggs in Paris is estimated at 165,000,000, and the total consumption of France at 800,000,000; but this, reckoning eggs at a sou, this single article represents 465 millions of francs.

MR. COBDEN AND THE ANGLO-FRENCH TREATY.—Mr. Cobden has addressed a letter from the President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, in which, after gratefully acknowledging the receipt of a communication conveying the thanks of the directors of the Chamber for his services in negotiating the recent treaty of commerce with France, he says:—"If I have rendered any service in the matter, it was in the commercial relations of the two countries, it has been only in the humble capacity of passenger to those who have fortunately possessed both the power and the inclination to give effect to my suggestions. It was owing to the readiness with which the Emperor Napoleon received the first overtures of the ever subsequently to the objects of the treaty, and to the enlightened appreciation by the Emperor and his Ministers of the French and his Ministers, together with the frank co-operation of Lord Cowley, that the negotiations were brought to a successful issue. I trust, after the lapse of a sufficient time for realising the effects of such a change, that it will become a lasting monument of the friendship between the great neighbouring nations, which will not only increase their material prosperity, but greatly assist in their moral and intellectual progress."

THE COAL FIELDS OF THE WORLD.—At the moment when the coal question is attracting the most intense degree of attention among political parties in England, in consequence of the commercial treaty, the following notice may be read with interest:—"The coal-fields of the northern of North America embrace an extent of 200,000 square kilometres (the kilometre = 0.62 of a mile), which is more than five times the surface so much as exceed 38,000 square kilometres, being divided as follows:—England, 1450 France, 3180; Belgium, 1140; Prussia, 8400; Saxony, 1000; Bavaria, 1000; Westphalia, 999; the Asturias, in Spain, 900; Russia, 350; and Saxony, 300. Although the extraction of coal is greatly developed in North America, the working of the mines is carried on much more actively in Europe. England annually extracts 66,000,000 tons; Belgium, 8,000,000; Prussia, 5,000,000. The United States only turn out 9,000,000 tons. Half a kilogramme of coal is found in the atmosphere of Manchester, and it is calculated that to do as much work as one man of ordinary strength could effect in a day, and three tons of coal will represent the labour which one man could perform in the whole life. Admitting that England annually employs 10,000,000 tons, the means produced in this fuel are equivalent to the work of sixty-six millions of vigorous men. The mass of coal in all the coal-producing districts of Europe and North America combined is estimated to be fifty times that which could be used during their whole lives by sixteen millions of men of average strength."

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

If there were not some bateleny genius to protect the labours and guard the interests of the Parisian dressmakers the political and religious excitement of the last few weeks, aided by the severity of the weather, must have produced an effect upon the display of fashion's fancies which would have been very serious. But these very days of April to enable it to recover. Fortunately for the ladies, the salons, the carnival, and the theatres, filled to repletion, have proved themselves to be the most serious consolation which could have enabled them to triumph over the dull winter season with which they were threatened. The new fashions displayed in the most select female circles are also considerably agitated by a question that still remains unsettled. Will crinoline be worn or not? That is the question. The two camps are again in presence. One perceives with regret, the other with pleasure, that, generally speaking, the dimensions of dresses are not to be reduced. Such choice, however, is left to the individual proportions.

Midway between winter and spring we have little to signalise in the way of novelty in the fashions displayed on our illustrations, unless it be the adoption for walking of striped woollen petticoats, composed of two colours, and soften colours to those which offended the eye last year. These petticoats are very generally worn at present by our leading fashionables, and effect them the facility of raising their dresses all round with their characteristic grace, and of doing considerable distances without running the risk of soiling their finery.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Sortie de Bal.—This cloak is composed of white cashmere, trimmed with down of the same colour, and is not only graceful in form but is also very light, and will keep the wearer full warm. The robe is of white satin, trimmed with festoons of pale blue tulle ruching, in the centre of each of which is a rosette of the same colour and material.

Fig. 2. Dress for an Evening Party.—This dress is of white taffetas antique, with mauve-coloured moire stripes, bordered with an edging of white satin. Its trimmings are of mauve ribbon. The corsage is low-necked, and straight between the shoulder-pieces, ornamented with a frill of narrow lace, and round-waisted. The sleeves are composed of a somewhat flattened puff, from which descends a narrow slanting flounce edged with a lace ruching. The single flounce of the skirt, cut en biais, is surmounted by a ruching of mauve ribbon. The sash attached to the side presents the appearance of a scarf.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1021.—VOL. XXXVI.] SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1860. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

SAVOY.

MANY and very recent indications in the discussions in Parliament lead to the belief that the difficulties, if any, of the Government are connected with the question of foreign policy. In every other department of their plans and intentions the Ministry, notwithstanding an irregular, though somewhat persistent, opposition, has been as yet, and seems likely to be, not merely successful but triumphant. But the complications in which the action of the Emperor of the French, and the unsettled and shifting nature of the subject which is generically denominated the Italian question, necessarily involve our diplomatic proceedings afford daily materials for comment, and may lead to a serious organisation in a sense hostile to the conduct of foreign affairs by those in whose hands it is at present placed. It is, however, satisfactory to witness that in all the criticism, more or less heated, of ex-officials and those Ishmaelitish members of Parliament who seem to think that personal and political independence consists in their turning their hands against every man in his turn, as well as in that of one or two honourable gentlemen who appear to be honestly interested in a certain settlement of the vexed question of foreign policy which at this moment is most prominent, there is a combination of testimony to the manly, straightforward, and dignified course pursued by Lord John Russell. It is hardly to be denied that when that noble Lord claimed for himself the seals of office as Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs some misgivings were felt as to whether he was not endeavouring to gratify an ambition rather than consulting the fitness of things. Recollections of his past career as a statesman did not supply any adequate ground for belief in his immediate qualification for the discharge of functions which, always requiring some skill in their performance, are at this juncture in a peculiarly delicate position. It is probable that this distrust was somewhat increased by a doubt whether the Foreign Secretary and the Premier were likely to be entirely in accord on this as on other points on which they would be required at least to exhibit unity of design and identity in action. On the whole it would seem that that idea has been fallacious. It is to be remarked that Lord Palmerston, hitherto the articulate organ on foreign affairs of every Ministry with which he has been connected, has entirely abnegated the duty he has been wont to perform, and has preserved a silence so decided and entire that it can only be attributed to the fact that Lord John Russell always speaks his mind and opinions, and accurately represents his wishes and intentions. Nay, more: it is, perhaps, not too much to hint that much of the tone if not exactly the spirit (for Lord John can be spirited enough when he likes) which have characterised the despatches and speeches of the Foreign Secretary have been derived from the inspirations of the arch-manipulator of Foreign Affairs who sits mute by his side in the House of Commons, but who probably is never absent from his side when the dangerous duty of putting pen to paper is in operation. It is not a little gain in the consideration of what course England is to take in the matters which call for decision on her part that there is tolerably general confidence that her honour and her interests are, on the whole, in safe and competent hands. It narrows very considerable the duty of Parliament and of the public when it is felt that what they have chiefly to do is to strengthen the hands of an Executive in which they can confide; and this circumstance ought to have a material influence on those discussions in the Senate, and those dissertations in the public journals, which are singularly needed at the present juncture.

It is mainly in the spirit which seems to have influenced the interposition of our Government that we would address ourselves to the consideration of the question of the annexation of Savoy to France. With no other than the most amicable tone we would urge remonstrance against such a step. Just as an intimate kind friend disposed to the utmost to promote the good of another with whom he is anxious to retain and extend feelings of cordiality and goodwill should every thinking Englishman, as far as in him lies, press on those who are contemplating this deed the imprudence, not to say the danger, which awaits its completion. It is not too much to say that it will at once generate mistrust in every country in Europe, and England in particular, against the ruling powers of France—a mistrust which will shortly ripen into aversion and hostility; and this exactly at a moment when so much and so many things are working together to place the alliance between this country and its nearest neighbour on such a footing as to give the strongest guarantee for tranquillity and peace, with all their attendant blessings. It needs no farseeing eye, and no spirit of prophecy, to enable one to comprehend that war is even now at hand. In the French capital the rumour is current, with marked circumstantiality, that a few weeks can hardly elapse before a collision will take place between Austria and Sardinia in the plains of Italy. It would seem, although it is not actually avowed, that on the annexation of Savoy to France is contingent the material assistance of the Emperor to the King of Sardinia in Central Italy; and, as it appears to us, Tuscany is indirectly held in reserve as a bonus, in addition to Lombardy, for the cession by Victor Emmanuel of his ancient hereditary domain. The answer of Count Cavour to the propositions of M. Thouvenel, though guarded and diplomatic enough, are also intelligible enough. It does not seem as if Piedmont was inclined to leave Tuscany to any such fate as the imposition of a ruler who would, in fact, be the nominee of France, would produce for that country. The answer of the Austrian Minister is also tantamount to a rejection of any other solution of the Italian question than one founded immediately on the arrangements of Villafranca and the treaty of Zurich. The situation seems to be that France will appropriate Savoy and leave the Italian idea to be fought out, as best it may, between the parties immediately concerned. What a lame and impotent conclusion to, and result of, that magnificent warlike enterprise which, most of any of modern times, was worthy to take rank in reference to the abstract enthusiasm which dictated it with the Crusades!

We hear a great deal of argument in favour of the annexation of Savoy to France which is founded on the idea of the desire of the people of that territory to become an integral portion of the French people; which, it is asserted, they have an absolute and indefeasible right to do. It seems to us that this principle of the abstract right of the people of any State to choose its rulers and its form of government has assumed a shape which is, to say the least of it, not quite consistent with the existing polity of Europe. It is not for any Englishman to deny that a hereditary Sovereign may forfeit his throne, and that revolution is not necessarily rebellion. But, unless it is solemnly laid down as a principle from which there is no appeal that provinces of an empire which have no complaint to make of unjust, or, to use the only word which expresses our meaning, of unconstitutional treatment, are at liberty to separate themselves from the body politic of that empire, and at their mere will and pleasure, or even under the influence of mere caprice, to attach themselves to another State, it is not easy to see how the annexation of Savoy to France can be asserted on the grounds of the wish of the Savoyards for such an annexation. It is not very possible to ascertain exactly what the will and desire of a people is, and it is necessary, in the first instance, to define of what the people so called consists. Of course the ready expedient is an appeal to universal suffrage; but surely in such a case, and with the experience which we have of that machinery for ascertaining the desires of a nation, its unanswerable efficacy will not be seriously urged in any quarter. If English statesmen are sincere in their adoption of this theory of the will of the people, we may gently hint that the time may come when it may be demanded in the case of Ireland; and we should be glad to know the reception which such a movement would obtain from those who at present seem inclined to admit the principle. To be sure, its practical application in the case of Savoy has not been conceded, and it is by no means certain that it is on that principle that the Emperor intends to act. It is on grounds of broad European policy that our Government is making a stand against the annexation of that country to France. It is on the temperate but firm protest which England makes on this question that the avoidance of all the manifold complications which this event must involve, and the averting of its completion, probably depends. It may be that advice and remonstrance, which cannot be otherwise than disinterested (for beyond its influence on the question of peace or war England has no absolute or direct interest in preventing this annexation), may be disregarded. If so, it is difficult to say to what extent that alliance, with regard to the strengthening and the permanence of which there have of late arisen such high hopes and expectations, may be perilled, and how soon a state of things may arise which will band all the nations of Europe against a Power which at this moment has at its command the capability of leading the march of civilisation and the material happiness of the world.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The whole of our Impression last week contained the address of the Emperor on the opening of the Legislative Chambers, and in a later edition we gave some particulars of the inaugural ceremony, which is thus described by the Paris correspondent of the Guardian:—

The Empress appeared at a quarter-past one, and was greeted by a cheer and by a general "hush" of etiquette and decorum. She was accompanied by the Princesses Clotilde and Mathilde, and took her place in a tribune under the gallery to the right of the throne. Her Majesty looked extremely well and very pretty, and the Princess Clotilde, as usual, full of character, intelligence, and perfect good breeding. I almost blush to confess that I overlooked the dress, but the Constitutionnel has been more thoughtful, and thus describes it:—"Her Majesty wore a costume of remarkably elegant simplicity. It consisted of a light grey silk dress, with black lace shawl, and a white crape bonnet, with white feather. In her Majesty's hair, immediately in front, shone a superb diamond. The Princess Clotilde was attired in blue and white, and the Princess Mathilde in dark velvet, with a China crape shawl, richly embroidered in gold." A quarter of an hour later the Emperor entered from the long gallery of the Louvre. He was cordially welcomed, and having bowed and seated himself, and the Assembly having been requested to do the same, received his speech from the Grand Master of the Ceremonies, and read it without rising from his chair.

The Imperial Government of Paris presented a bill to the Corps Legislatif, on Friday, to the effect that the import duties on all those articles which by the treaty of commerce were not to be reduced till July 1 shall be lowered immediately; and the Chamber is called upon to vote the measure as one of urgency.

The Moniteur of Tuesday says:—"Some German papers announce that the French artillery has been increased by the creation of three new regiments. The fact is, the number of batteries having been reduced, the artillery has in reality undergone a reduction." The Moniteur also contains the nomination of twenty-one sous-prefects.

Baron Gros has, we are informed by the Paris correspondent of the Daily News, been appointed by the French Government to discharge once more a mission similar to that of the Earl of Elgin, whom he will accompany to China.

The Opinion Nationale says that the National Guard of France is to be augmented to the number of 1,500,000 men.

The Cardinals and Prelates who are members of the French Senate have presented to the House petitions demanding the maintenance of the temporal power of the Pope.

On Sunday the Minister of the United States presented his lettres de créance. The Moniteur of Sunday contains the nomination of M. Greterin as senator.

Marshal Reille, the senior Marshal of France, has just died, at the age of eighty-five. He commanded a corps-d'armée at Waterloo. He married a daughter of Massena, and leaves three sons, one of whom is a Colonel in the army, the second a Lieutenant, and the third a member of the Corps Legislatif.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

The Madrid papers are discussing the possibility of holding the territory acquired in Africa. The Ministerial journals assert that it would entail sacrifices greater than any advantages Spain is likely to obtain.

The latest news from the seat of war is to the effect that General Echague has commenced a forward movement from Serallo, but it is not known in what direction. Probably the movement is made with a view to operations against Tangier.

The Eco de Tetuan asserts that an engagement has taken place between two Kabyle tribes in the neighbourhood of Tetuan, and that the tribe favourable to the Spaniards was victorious.

ITALY.

The Italian difficulty it seems is far from being at an end. We record elsewhere the severe measures recently adopted by the Austrian authorities in Venetia, and the vast military preparations which, according to eyewitnesses, are being made in that province. Piedmont, also, is arming to the teeth. Letters from Turin say that Victor Emmanuel will shortly have 180,000 men fit to take the field.

The reply of Count Cavour to the French propositions declares the desire of the Sardinian Government to give effect to the views of the Emperor, but foresees immense difficulties in carrying them out. So far as the "autonomy" of Tuscany is in question, Sardinia never had any intention to interfere with the self-disposal of that State. As a pledge of her deference to suffrage, if the vote for annexation should be favourable it is impossible for her to repudiate it, as it would be dangerous to impose upon a people a solution which must give rise to the same difficulties as in the Romagna, where the vicariat proposed will be accepted. Buoncompagni is requested to leave Central Italy during the taking of the vote, in confirmation of which it may be stated that a letter from the Chevalier Buoncompagni has been published, stating that he has resigned the post of Governor-General.

The Tuscan people have been summoned, by a decree of the Provisional Government, to decide by their votes, on the 11th and 12th inst., the question whether Tuscany shall be annexed to Piedmont, or shall constitute a separate State. The decision will be given by universal suffrage, every male Tuscan who is twenty-one years old and enjoys his civil rights being entitled to vote. The people of the Romagna have likewise been summoned to record on the same day, by universal suffrage, their decision on similar questions respecting the Romagna.

A letter from Rome states that great agitation prevails in the Marches. Tricoloured flags have been hoisted nightly at Viterbo. It is asserted that the Papal Government is preparing a note accusing Piedmontese agents of exciting the inhabitants. Revolutionary agents have induced the inhabitants to give up smoking and taking part in the lottery.

A Government ordinance was issued at Florence on Tuesday, suppressing all former decrees which might tend to modify or restrain the liberty of the press on political matters.

The situation of affairs appears to be very critical at Nice. On the anniversary of the promulgation of the Sardinian Constitution, a few days ago, manifestations were made by the Piedmontese party in the Italian Theatre. A demonstration also took place in the French Theatre, where the population of Nice demanded the "Ode Napoleon" and the "Reine Hortense," which were performed amidst enthusiastic applause and shouts for the Emperor and annexation.

A great display of military took place at Naples on the 1st instant. Some persons of high distinction were arrested. The Prince Torella was conducted to the Prefecture of Police, but was set at liberty again. His brother, the Marquis de Bella, is detained. It is stated that several noblemen are about to be exiled. Activity prevails in the arsenals day and night. Letters from Sicily announce that the Attorney-General at Messina has been murdered, and that a fulminating bomb has been thrown at the Director of Police, by which two persons were wounded.

AUSTRIA.

An Imperial patent was published on Tuesday ordering the augmentation of the Imperial Council by extraordinary Councillors, who are to be assembled periodically. The Emperor himself will appoint for life as members of the Council the Archdukes, the clerical dignitaries, and some distinguished persons belonging to the civil and military branches. The Provincial Diets are to propose thirty-eight members, subject to the approval of the Emperor, who will choose every member from a list of three candidates presented by the Diets. These members will take their seats in the Council for six years. The following are the subjects which will be submitted to the discussion of the Council:—The budget; the examination of the balance of public accounts, the demands of the commission for the public debt, and important projects of general laws. The Council will take no initiative in the discussion of the wishes of the Provincial Diets. The Ministers and the heads of the public central offices are entitled to take part in the discussions of the Council. The arrangement of the rules for transacting the business of the Council is reserved. The Councillors are to have no allowances from the Treasury. Another Imperial ordinance convokes the assembly of the Councillors for the month of May next, in order to examine the budget for 1861, for which purpose, and for the active preparation of the establishment of the Provincial Diets, the Emperor will call competent men from all the provinces.

A letter from Vienna asserts that, in reply to questions from the Envoys of various foreign Powers, the Austrian Cabinet declared that Austria will not protest against the annexation of Savoy to France, inasmuch as her interests will not be directly affected by it, and that she will be as passive as England, Prussia, and Russia were during the recent campaign in Lombardy.

A recent order of the Austrian Governor of Venetia directs that all Venetians suspected of disaffection shall be compelled to enter the military service, and shall be formed into penal companies. A notification has been issued at Venice directed against the practice of persons wearing beards on their chins. To this irregularity another is added—viz., that of wearing the hats called à la Cavour, which are considered as the emblem of the party opposed to the Imperial and Royal Government. The notice enjoins all to conform exactly to the Imperial order as regards the beard; and ordains that they cannot, moreover, on any account, be allowed to wear hats à la Cavour. For breaches of this order disciplinary punishments are prescribed.

A despatch from Presburg on the 6th inst. states that the Evangelical community of Hungary have unanimously refused to submit to the Imperial decree of the 1st of September, and to the Ministerial ordinance of the 2nd of September.

PRUSSIA.

The presentation of a petition in favour of Italian liberty led to a debate in the Chambers at Berlin, on Thursday last, of some interest. The speakers may be divided into three classes—MM. de Prittwitz and de Bonin, Protestant Conservatives, who defended legitimacy and deplored the attacks upon the temporal power of the Pope; MM. Reichensperger, de Mallinkrodt, and de Berg, Catholics, who broke a lance for Austria; and MM. Dohrn, Behrend, de Bentkowski (Pole), and Baron Vincke, who spoke eloquently on behalf of the rights and liberties of the Italians. M. de Schleinitz (Minister of Foreign Affairs) expressed his regret that the subject had been introduced, as, though the Congress had not yet met, the Government were exerting themselves to bring it together. Ultimately the Chamber adopted the order of the day as proposed by the Commission.

UNITED STATES.

The Senate, in executive session on the 21st ult., ratified the treaty of amity and commerce with Paraguay; the one previously ratified is for indemnity. The Mexican treaty had been reported and read, and its further consideration postponed until the 27th ult. The resolutions for the acquisition of Cuba and the Canadas were before the Senate on the 21st, as was also the French Spoliation Bill, and the Bill for International Copyright. Mr. Seward had introduced a bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Wyandot Constitution. It was made the special order for the 29th of February.

The complications between the North and South have undergone no change, and Mr. Lamar, in a speech in the Senate on the 21st, on the question of slavery, said "the South were determined that the institution of slavery should be maintained as an existing fact in the Confederacy."

The Boston Daily Atlas says:—"The correspondence with the English Government touching the north-western boundary line has been resumed, each party claiming a clear title to the island of San Juan. It will probably be settled by England taking the island and yielding some other points as a satisfactory equivalent."

A grand mass meeting of those in favour of upholding the Union, the Constitution, and the laws of the country, and of securing the rights of the several States inviolate; resisting all attempts to interfere with their respective institutions and policy; opposed to all sectional parties, and in favour of elevating men to office who would administer the Government in the spirit of its founders, was held at New York on the night of the 21st of February.

The news from California is rather meagre. The silver-mines discovered at Mount St. Helens, in Napa County, had proved to be of little value; while the excitement concerning the Washoe silver-mines continued unabated. The sales of claims made in San Francisco during the two weeks previous to the departure of the mail amounted to 130,000 dollars. Upwards of 100,000 signatures had been appended to the petition to the Legislature to prevent the immigration of the Chinese.

Great excitement prevailed at Lynn, Massachusetts, arising out of a shoemakers' strike. The ringleaders had been arrested.

A hurricane at Orleans had done serious damage to shipping and buildings.

Washington's birthday and the inauguration of the monument to his memory were the cause of much excitement throughout the States.

The Legislature of Kansas, having in the usual course presented to the Governor, for his ratification, the bill abolishing slavery in that territory, he gave it his veto. Nevertheless, the Legislature has taken it up again, and there is every probability that they will pass it, notwithstanding the vote.

INDIA.

We have received the Bombay papers to the 9th of February. They contain very little news of interest. The following extracts are from the Bombay Standard:—"Lord Canning, we learn from a north-west contemporary, held a grand durbar in Umballah at noon on the 49th of January, at which the Maharajah of Putteealah, the Rajah of Jheend, and a large assemblage of other Princes and nobles were present. A serious disturbance has broken out in the city of the Nizam, such as has not been known therein for several years past. The Right Hon. James Wilson arrived in Calcutta on Tuesday evening, the 24th of January, and a Council was held on Wednesday, at which some important financial questions were discussed.

On the 7th of February the Bombay, Baroda, and Central India Railway Company were to open formally the first portion of their line. Great preparations were made at Broach in celebration of the event, and trains were to start from Amrolee and Kurgan at eight a.m. for Broach, leaving again for those stations in the afternoon.

The object of the expedition against the Wuzzerees has been accomplished, and the murderer of the late Captain Meeham has been surrendered, and was taken into Bunnoo on the 22nd of January. He had been slightly wounded by his captors, and was removed on a charpoy. He has confessed to having been the chief agent in the murder.

In consequence of orders transmitted from England, the strength of the expedition from India to China will be smaller than the number stated in previous accounts.

The Lucknow Herald says it has news from the frontiers to the effect that Jung Bahadoor has surrendered the Begum and her son Burjees Kedr unconditionally, without any stipulation for their maintenance; and that they have arrived at Gonda, and will be sent on to Lucknow. Should this news be confirmed, there is no longer any rebel leader in the field, of high or low degree, in Nepaul.

The exportation of gold from Australia to this country since 1851 sums up to nearly seventy-five millions sterling.

The gigantic project of a railway from Moscow to Tiflis, through Kiew—thus uniting Russia and Central Asia—is being worked out conjointly at Paris and St. Petersburg.

Some hundreds of hives of honey bees have recently been exported from New York State to the Pacific coast. They cost about £3 a hive, and realise £15. The honey bee does not thrive in California without artificial aid, although the country seems to afford abundant means of subsistence.

Hilmi Pacha, Governor of Adrianople, has been accidentally drowned whilst performing his ceremonial ablutions in a river during a morning ride.

LATEST NEWS FROM ABROAD.

The following telegrams were received through Mr. Reuter's office yesterday (Friday) morning :—

PARIS, Thursday, March 8.—The Patrie of this evening says :—"We believe we are in a position to state that, on the question of Savoy, Sardinia shows such conciliatory intentions as could be expected from a country which owes its aggrandizement to France."

CONSTANTINOPLE, March 3 (via Trieste).—Sir Henry Bulwer will shortly proceed to England on family affairs. The Western Powers have made appeals to the Porte to assist in the maintenance of its rights in Servia and the Danubian Principalities should any complications and an armed intervention take place there. It is stated that the Porte has requested a treaty of alliance with them for certain emergencies.

TURIN, March 8.—The Opinione affirms that, in the note of the 2nd inst. relative to Savoy, Count Cavour expresses the attachment of the Sardinian Government to the principles of 1815, at the same time, true to the principle which he supports in Central Italy, he declares his intention to interrogate the population in a manner to be established by Parliament, respecting beside the questions of the frontiers and guarantees to be given to Savoy.

FRANKFORT, Thursday.—In to-day's sitting of the Federal Diet the proposals of the Holstein committee have been accepted. In the discussion which preceded the adoption of the proposals, the Danish Ambassador protested against any limitation of the sovereignty of the King, against the right of the Holstein Diet to pass definitive resolutions, and against the right of the Federal Diet to send executive troops. He further delared the readiness of the King to give up the projected assembly of delegates, and stated that the Danish Government prefers to treat direct with the States. The publication of the protocol of this letter of the Federal Diet was resolved upon.

AUSTRALIA.

Our advices from Melbourne are to the 17th of January. Parliament continued to business on the 12th of that month, after the Christmas recess. There is still much political apathy. The volunteer movement is progressing rapidly in Victoria, under the auspices of the new Commander of the Forces in Australia, Major-General Pratt, arrived on January 4. The remunerative character of the gold-fields exhibits a highly satisfactory state of things in the Treasury. A new gold-field has been discovered at the head of the Yarra, in one of the branches of the Australian Alps, in a locality which, from the scrubby and rocky character of the country, had never been explored.

The Sydney Morning Herald of the 13th of January, in its summary of news for the month, says :—"The Parliament has adjourned until late in January, a vote of credit for the whole of the month having first been given. The Government surveyors in the valley of the Lachlan have reported that coal exists there in large and valuable quantities. The Assembly has assented to the principle of subdividing the auriferous watercourse from Adelong to Tumut, but as they are not agreed as to the terms of the subsidy, so as to the course which it would have been best for the line to take. The various mineral districts of Sydney have been visited for personal examination during the last fortnight. The results of these examinations have in no instance been highly satisfactory. The mountains of the Hanging Rock, Peel River, and Abercrombie diggings are encouraging, as the term former puts it, in stating that there is more evidence of a permanent settlement than upon any other of the gold fields. In the neighbourhood of the Abercrombies there are about 5000 miners hard at work. A very beautiful nugget, weighing forty ounces, has been found here by a Mr. M'Guinness." Information has been received from New South Wales by electric telegraph from Sydney to Melbourne, to Jan. 16. Flood has resigns his seat for Canterbury. Bush fires are raging at Botany, Kondivoi, and North Shore. The Champion cricket match played some time ago, on Saturday. The latter in their first innings scored 81, the Champions 64, when the stumps were drawn with five wickets down.

From South Australia we hear that the harvest is as good as could have been expected after so dry a season, and that the best hopes of many have been blighted by the continued drought. The general monetary position of the colony is sound, and the insolvencies for the month have been comparatively insignificant. The mineral districts have been remarkably steady during the month, with a slight tendency to improvement.

M. Jullien attempted upsides in Paris last week by stabbing himself.

A medal has been instituted by Royal decree in Belgium, to be struck at the Mint, and worn by persons connected with the medical profession as distinguish themselves by skill and devotedness during times of epidemic diseases.

CUBA.—The Captain-General issued an order on the 10th ult. stopping the importation of Chinese emigrants into the island after the 31st of December next, owing, as a reason, that a sufficient number had arrived (with those to arrive) to call that kind of labour.

JAMAICA.—The Governor has issued the Royal proclamation proroguing the Legislature from the 7th of February to the 15th of March. The weather has been highly favourable for sugar-making, and in regard to progress throughout the island, with every prospect of resulting in a crop that increase that of last year's crop. The young canes are also looking extremely well and promising.

ARRIVAL OF GAME IN VICTORIA FROM ENGLAND.—We learn from the Melbourne Argus that the cases shipped by Messrs. Gurney for Mr. Thomas Austin, of Barwon Park, was landed on the evening of December 20 on the wharf at Geelong, and the partridges duly sent up by the Melbourne. There were, however, left 65 partridges, 4 hares and 25 wild rabbits, all in perfectly good order. Mr. Austin proposes to start the following day to their destination.

BARRADOES.—Agriculture met on the 7th ult. Nothing of consequence transpired in the House of Assembly. The greater part of the sitting was taken up with discussion on the petition of the Supreme Court of Appeal Act. Nothing of further consequence was done, and the House adjourned for a week. The yacht had lately commenced, and the weather was being made pretty generally throughout the country. Sandiges, a Negress accused of the sisticide; in other respects the public health was good.

MEXICO.—All the statements published give a frightful picture of the social and political condition of that country. Neither life nor property is safe, and public tranquillity in the hands of men whose only pleasure seems to be in shedding it. Miramon was expected to reach Vera Cruz the 1st inst. The city was well fortified. Miramon was without artillery. The whole of the shipbuilders of Mobile have been employed to build a vessel of war. The American left 4 million dollars' worth of property behind. The Spanish Consul-General, Don Joaquin, in which the Miramon party have been robbed.

MURDER AT CONSTANTINOPLE.—On Thursday night, February 16, a murder was committed in the quarter of Fenerguatche-Tekeie, in Stambouli, on the road of Dondoli Tchifta, a retired merchant, named Ono Hadji Hovsnie, a tobacconist in the quarter of St. Sophia, and exercised the usury. He entered the house of the usurer, which is open on the forsakkrest, and stabbed the old man to death. The assassin was immediately arrested, and brought to the chief police office, where the victim's wife and a son twenty years of age were also placed under arrest.

RICHARD COBDEN AND THE WAR IN AUSTRIAN ITALY.—A letter from Verona of February 21 says :—"Although the cessation of war, and the hope of peace, have given rise to new preparations here, we also expects a formidable contest. For the present the Austrians have arrived at Legnago with enormous quantity of munitions, which has been immediately sent on to Padua, which is the centre of the line, and the strategic position of which brings the line of rail from Dolo to Padua yet to be soon nicked canon of recent fabrication. There are enough of them, it is said, to mount about twenty batteries. They are field-pieces, but seem few as heavy ordnance for branching; both were cast in the arsenals of Vienna. Were the works are carried on night and day. Here are still digging and repairing the moats round the old fortifications. They have just placed the new rifled bronze guns, and removed the iron guns which they are building a fort at Piovo, and strengthening those two sides. They are Modenese, and near the Church of the Madonna di Campagna. At Peschiera they are working in all haste on the construction of batteries on the Mincio side, on that of San Vergilio and of Gisano. Provisions are being stored up in the forts; they have even gone to Milan and purchased corn and forage for the Austrian army. We believe that the agents of every important house in our city have been to Milan for no other reason. Our towns are deserte; you must know that latter then somehow. Arrests and propositions continue."

THE GREAT VOLUNTEER DAY.

On Wednesday the Volunteer service may be said to have attained its majority. It went through all the ceremonies which English usage prescribes for that critical stage of existence : in the morning it made its obeisance to our gracious Sovereign ; in the afternoon it dined together at St. James's Hall; and in the evening it gave a ball at the Floral Hall, Covent-garden.

THE LEVEE.

The Queen's reception of Volunteer officers at St. James's Palace presented a stirring and brilliant spectacle. Prince Consort and the Prince of Wales appeared at the Levee in volunteer uniform, the former as Colonel of the Hon. Artillery Company, and the latter as Colonel of the Oxford University Corps. Shortly after, the Lords Lieutenant and Deputy Lieutenants of the City arrived : were the Duke of Wellington, Lord Salisbury, Lord Mayor, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Bart, Sir Percy and Sir Hugh Grosvenor, and numerous other officers were present, and among them were such well-known promoters of the movement as the Duke of Wellington, Lord Elcho, and Richard Cobden, M.P. Unfortunately, it is impossible, we shall have in our next Number a list of the officers presented.

Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Consort, on their arrival, were received from Buckingham Palace room after two o'clock, attended by the Lords-in-Waiting and Equerries in Waiting. The Queen was in a rich velvet trimmed with point lace ; the petticoat of white satin, trimmed with the same costly material to correspond. The Queen wore a velvet diadem of gold and diamonds as a headdress.

The Colonels of the Volunteers were joined in the throne-room by the Lords Lieutenant of their counties, who accompanied them to the Throne-room, and presented them to the Queen. The Lord Lieutenant, the Lord Lieutenant, they were introduced by the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department.

The officers began to arrive at twelve o'clock, and were conducted to the Drawing-room, where refreshments were laid out, including wine, sherry, and other apurtenants of the Palace, and were formed into companies. The precedence of each regiment was determined by the date at which their services had been originally accepted. The Artillery, of which there are three corps, had the precedence of every other corps, and the remainder as they were well represented. Next in order followed the Middlesex, the Lancashire, and the Yorkshire Hussars. Then came the Gloucestershire and Devonshire Mounted Rifles ; then came the eighty-three rifle corps, consisting of upwards of 20,000 men, among whom the Surrey, Warwickshire, Middlesex, and Lancashire formed the van ; and as the representatives of the Scotch Rifles, the Edinburgh Company, which was received with a loud "fell in—two deep," considerable interest was aroused at the appearance of the Inverness and Aberdeen Rifles. That officers of the Scotch Rifles, in perfect state of discipline, and the reputation its members have long borne for accuracy of aim, should be present at the ceremonies and festivities in the field, is universally admitted to be, per excellence, the "crack corps" amongst the "crack" of the Volunteer force. At the gun-fire, which has been the Goddess of Punctuality, could not have been more exact. The Inverness and Aberdeen Rifles were followed by the Irish Volunteers. The stately black uniforms of the Victorias led the way ; thats more or less green and grey uniforms of the Dublin and Wicklow Companies succeeded like the order of military array, but nevertheless the attempt was made. The Irish Volunteers were followed by Sydney Smith's Company, Hampshire, and subdivisions headed by their senior officer. A list of the officers of each corps presented by him to the Lord Lieutenant, who stood at the right of the Queen, and read the names aloud. Meanwhile the officers drew up incontinently in line before her Majesty, bowed, and retired.

THE DINNER.

About 1000 officers of the Volunteer service dined together at a grand banquet at St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, on Wednesday. The banquet was sided ; and his Royal Highness was supported on his right by the Lord Chancellor, and on his left by Earl Spencer, Lord Privy Seal. Seated crowded with ladies, and with officers who had been sufficiently forthcoming to secure tickets for the banquet.

After the usual loyal toasts Earl De Grey and Ripon rose and proposed the health of the Prince of Wales.

His Royal Highness returned thanks, and then proposed "The Volunteer Force, and Success to it." He said he was a Volunteer himself. "I must congratulate you all upon the earnest desire which the meeting I see before me indicates to maintain the movement in existence. I feel myself especially necessary that to be of any use this movement should be continuous, and that the Volunteer force should be a permanent institution, and not a aggressive. I deny that altogether. It is a movement entirely of defence. It is a movement which proposes to render the old feudal castle walls to defend us, no enemy could come across the Channel without being aware of the fact, and we have, by the means of the improvements of modern times lead us to the conviction that for our real country to be invaded successfully by any foreign power is impossible always be in a position of perfect security ; that we should be able to say to the world, 'Come if you like, we are ready for you.' I am not aware opposed to this movement agrees that not to be afraid we ought to be prepared to meet any enemy. I believe that to be the best way to secure us. For my own part, I rejoice exceedingly, and I am sure everybody in this hall must rejoice with me, that this spirit will spread, and that from this movement afford, that when the occasion arises there is not a man among us who will not come forward to do his best to join the defence of his country. But it would be a great error to suppose that because I, the head of the Army, appear at a meeting of this kind, that I look upon it in any way deficient for defensive purposes. Your function is not to take the place of the regular army, but to assist it. I feel sure that you will be the best supplement of the regular Army will be yourselves. There is the militia which is a force of which I am very proud. It is one of the most and largest regiments of militia, and really when I see the line and militia regiments I feel that I am at the head of a large force. Then I call the first reserve of the Army. The volunteer force, of which you are the first branch. I look upon it as a reserve force. I have remarked with great pleasure that this movement is taking root throughout the country. I have received letters from various parts desirous to drill. That is the most likely way in which to make this movement permanent. I am glad to see that the Scotch are so much interested. It may not be in the common acceptation of the term. We have no conception, for instance, but perhaps a country where you have such a display of military spirit as this volunteer movement affords. Arnim, are in our midst, and we have a large body of them here. I am glad to have concluded by paying a high compliment to the Under-Secretary for War, Earl De Grey and Ripon, for the zeal which he has shown for the last year in all matters relating to the Volunteer Corps.

Earl De Grey (Under Secretary for War) returned thanks for the Volunteer service, and said : The Volunteer corps throughout the kingdom might now be considered as complete. The number of Volunteers he had no doubt they would reach the vast number of 100,000 strong.

THE BALL.

The brilliant entertainment given at the new Floral Hall, Covent-garden, was a triumph almost close to the volunteer dem onstration. From the time the doors were opened at half-past eight o'clock the promenades were blocked up the streets leading to Covent-garden, and visitors were scarcely able to obtain admission. The Floral Hall itself was filled to overflowing like of carriages. The new Floral Hall itself, under the influence of a brilliant gas, and the Volunteer uniforms, presented a most animated appearance, and the general effect of the scene, with the throngs of uniforms and ladies, was very striking. Dancing was commenced at nine, and adopted was very successful. At the base of the roof there was a broad gallery, and on the floor of this gallery were a number of refreshment bars, at each end of the hall were circles of gay ; and chrysanthemums, wrouthed with evergreens, adorned the top of the roof. One of the two galleries, with its separate seats, was devoted to the lady patronesses, and the other to the musicians. At the end of the hall was a platform for the band of the Coldstream Guards, and the pit and stalls being used as a resting place. The supper was laid out in the orchestra and shop beneath. The ball was a most enthusiastic success provided. Messrs. Staples, who undertook this department, are noted for their efficiency, and their arrangements were on the most liberal scale. Mr. Gunter, who supplied the general refreshments, had also made ample provision for the supper. The arrangements for the refreshments were very difficult, but the rush to the supper-room somewhat relieved the pressure of the crowd. The decorations of the hall were under the able inspiration of Messrs Coote and Tinney's band, and lancers, valse, and quadrille succeeded each other in rapid succession. The floor, from the graceful decorations of the ball and supper-room greatly enhanced the general effect. The number of persons present on the occasion was estimated at 8000. It is scarcely necessary to remark that the Royal Volunteer Ball will be annually repeated.

We intend to give an illustration of the Floral Hall next week.

The inauguration, as it may fairly be designated, of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, was performed by Mr. Laing, the chairman of the members in the Senate House. The day in the town was almost universally observed as a holiday. Flags were displayed from every window, and the church bells, ringing merrily, gave early note of preparation.

The Board of Works have given £500 premium for the site of Berkeley House for their new offices, and £100 for the old materials. The cost of the building is estimated at £16,000, and the ground rent is £500 a year for the first ten years, and £350 afterwards.

Hill, Major-General Clement Hill (chief equerry of the Queen), and of the Marchioness of Anglesea, who died at Plas Newydd, January 25, 1815), and Sir Thomas Neal Hill, Sir Robert C. Hill and Sir Clement Hill survived him.

AN OUTBREAK OF A MUTINOUS CHARACTER took place on Tuesday week on board the Diadem at Plymouth, which was of a nature similar to that which recently took place on board the Princess Royal at Portsmouth, and which arose from a dissatisfaction among the liberty men. As on previous occasions the leave on shore was considerably contracted, and the men on their return were ordered to be mustered on deck, when a portion of the original cause of the disturbance was stated, raised a shout for "More leave!" No violence or insubordination ensued, and the men were ordered below, and the leave was restored as before, Captain Cockburn having ordered the sailors for their improper conduct. It is hoped that matters should be made right in a manner by which they, with some reluctance, returned to their duty. The next day two months will be the time for the ship's company to be paid off, when they will be sent and one month to the remainder, and they obtained leave for the night. On Thursday the ship was paid off, and the men sent on shore. It is stated that Captain Cockburn was so well pleased with the conduct of the Marines that he requested Captain Jolliffe to remit all punishments then in progress.

FEARFUL COLLIERY ACCIDENT.

An explosion, causing the death of about eighty persons, occurred yesterday week at Hetton Colliery, situated in the town of Killing, near north station, on the North-Eastern Railway, six miles to the north-east of Durham. At the time of the explosion about one hundred men and boys went down the pit on the day-shift, all of them being workmen. At half-past two o'clock, according to the statement of one of the brothers, named Robert and George Allen, the pit fired in their immediate vicinity. The first explosion was followed by a cry of "Fire!" and simultaneously the men were hurried to take to their beds and run out of danger. After they had got about three-quarters of a mile from the scene of explosion they had begun to ascend the steps to the bottom of the shaft, and were saved. The alarm having now been given, the workmen at the pit-head, who were engaged in getting the many hundreds who stood for hours almost silent spectators of the ghastly proceedings.

It seems that a small quantity of gas in one of the workings exploded at the bottom of the shaft, and communicated with the main body of carburetted passage, and became connected with a larger volume of explosive vapour in one of the large "dandy" workings, about 1,000 yards to the rear of the "broken" coal.

The blaze was felt at the down-cast shaft, and a little boy, who had noticed it, ran and alarmed the residents in the neighbouring cottages. The deputies and overmen were not down in the pit fortunately, as they merely making efforts to rescue those who were known to be in the pit. The explosion was followed by a rush of fire, smoke, and foul air from the up-cast shaft, proceeding so far as the "after-damp" and sulphurous vapour would permit, practically to the bottom of the up-cast shaft, but by the time they got to the bottom of the shaft they "brattice" or thin planks of wood, to stop up every passage, and so to force the current of fresh air from the pit-shaft to accompany them. In all directions were found broken lumps, fragments of clothing, parts of tools and shoes, indicative of the terrific force of the explosion. The secretary of the Miners' Provident Association was among those who perished. Mr. Forster, manager, and Thomas Fair and Robert Jefferson, who went down the pit to assist in recovering the bodies, were suffocated by the choke-damp.

An inquest was held on Monday afternoon upon a number of the bodies. The jury returned a verdict of "Died by an explosion in the mine, but how the explosion originated there was no evidence to show."

A subscription has been opened for the relief of the families of the sufferers, and it is to be hoped that the public generally will respond to the appeal which will be made.

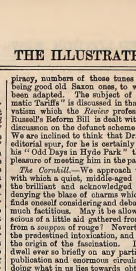
LITERATURE.

RUBBING THE GILT OFF. By JOHN HOLLINGSHEAD. J. C. Holten, Not long since we noticed with the favour it deserved a reprint of certain papers contributed by Mr. Hollingshead to Household Words, which appeared under the title of "Under Bow Bells." The subject-matter of those essays related chiefly, if not wholly, to transactions connected with what is emphatically called "the City," and trade and commerce, in a new issue of a similar kind, which has appeared under the name of "Rubbing the Gilt Off," we are presented with a "West-end Book for all Readers," in which the papers extend themselves over numerous subjects, interwoven with political and social life, as distinguished from the shopkeeping phase of English existence; and they are characterized by a vein of observation, an appreciation of the reality of things, and a dipping below the surface, which the strong spice of caricature in the style by no means tends to hide or diminish. The reasoning—for reasoning it is—would have been equally efficacious without the banter, but then we would equally have the banter as well, while, of course, the author believes in its value himself, and not without justice. The papers entitled "The Humiliation of Fegmore," and "The Pet of the Law," are, we think, especially noticeable for their sarcastic dealing with two most important questions severally allied to our representative system and our criminal law, and this the more so because the ludicrous point of view, though broadly taken, is not quite so extravagant as in some of the other essays.

WHO'S WHO IN 1860. Baily, Cornhill.

This exceedingly useful annual has reached its fourth year, and comes before the public with all its former, and in some respects further, claims to patronage. There is no guide-book which lies on the desk or table more ready of reference, one which contains so much well-arranged personal information, with regard to every one who can be designated a public man; and so far as we have tested it, which is frequently enough, its correctness is one of its main features.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.



Blackwood.—Founding himself on Mr. Oliphant's narrative of the Earl of Elgin's mission to China and Japan, the writer of the first article in Blackwood has given to those who desire to run while they read an excellent resumé of the Chinese question in all its bearings during the years 1857-58-59. It is written in a very pleasant and amusing style, and is excellent as a rapid dioramic view of the events of the period to which it belongs. The didactic poem entitled "St. Stephen's" is brought to a conclusion, and this portion has risen far higher than that in any previous numbers. Although the verse is not of the very best, and the expression often forced and not apt, there can be no doubt of the fidelity of the sketches of the orators which the author professes to draw. We would particularly point to those of Plunkett, Mackintosh, Macaulay (particularly happy and true), and Peel, who has the best defence made for his character as a politician that we have ever yet seen, often as it has been done in prose. There is a very striking vindication of Nelson in reference to the mutiny-at-the-Nore of his conduct in the affair of Carscoolo; and an admirable article on Feilding's "Tom Jones," which, we confess, has come home to our own ideas of that vaunted production. Perhaps, however, the writer has not sufficiently taken into consideration the fact that Feilding was in reality the first who emancipated himself from the school of novel-writing which had prevailed up to his time, and which alone would have been merit enough, even if he had gone less far towards the perfection which is generally claimed for him than he actually has. The political articles—namely, that on "The Foreign Connection of the House of Bull" and "The Anglo-Gallican Budget"—are composed in such a pleasant, good-humoured tone that even those who dissent from the point of view of the authors will find them very agreeable reading. After a pointed hitting through the general mass we have no allusion to placing Blackwood at the head of the monthly periodicals in every sense of the term.

Fraser certainly stands next. The unpublished Letters of Shelley are valuable contributions to a topic which is not without its interest still, although we confess to an idea that the subject is just a little gone by. The article entitled "Louis Napoleon's Intentions Tested by his Conduct" is to a certain extent prophetic, written as it must have been before the latest demonstration of that Sovereign; and we are certain that no one, whatever his opinions on the subject in question may be, who reads it will be inclined to deny that on the whole it is eminently suggestive, and displays considerable knowledge of the quiet, almost silent, course of the Emperor's policy. The paper on "Genuine Reasoner" is entertaining; not by any means in the lowest sense of the term; and the gossip of that entitled "The Literary Society of the Eighteenth Century" is, we think, fuller of matter than those on the same subject which have preceded it. Mr. Lever's Let on the Budget is a guarantee for an examination of the financial plan of the Ministry on orthodox commercial principles. It is curious to learn from the article "On the Wine Duties" how very considerable has been the diminution of drinking as a national habit in this country, and, as regards wine more especially, the cessation of a class of persons who were called three and four bottle men that had a very great effect in that diminution. "Holmby House" is concluded, but the other fiction goes on; while A. K. H. B. proses agreeably "Concerning the Worries of Life and How to Meet Them."

Macmillan opens with a fresh chapter of "Tom Brown at Oxford," in which a valuable matter is very spirited description of a boat-race. We do not know that there is anything very new in the paper on "The Townsfolks and Government by Families," but the facts relating to a curious phase of the history of our governing classes are well put together; and we may remark, in passing, that bit a of evidence as that of Lord Campbell being the author of "Junius" is rather adroitly introduced. The next article which is likely to catch the eye at this moment is that on "Nationality and the Idea of Nationality;" while Mr. Percy Greg's dealing with Lord Dundonald's biography, in the paper entitled "A Chapter on Modern Knight-errantry," will be read with interest even by those who have gone through the numerous dissertations on this subject which have already appeared. There are no less than twelve articles in Macmillan this month; and, on the whole, we are inclined to think that it is the best number which has been published, and that is meant to be high praise.

The Universal Review is, we fancy, a thought heavier than usual. The selection of articles is marked by the tact and discrimination which characterise the conduct of this periodical, but somehow there is not so much of the vigour and spirit which we have hitherto observed in the articles. The paper on the "Ulster Revivals" is the least obnoxious to this criticism; and next to that we are inclined to place the discussion on "National Music," in which we are not sorry to find some old English melodies rescued from Scotch and Irish piracy, numbers of those tunes which pass current as Celtic airs being good old Saxon ones, to which Scotch and Irish words have been adapted. The subject of "Commercial Treaties and Diplomatic Tariffs" is discussed in that tone of mild and elastic Conservatism which the Review professes to advocate; while Lord John Russell's Reform Bill is dealt with by anticipation, in the form of a discussion on the cabinet scheme of Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli. We are inclined to think that Dr. Newman has received a prick of the editorial spur, for he is certainly more up to the mark this month in his "Old Days in Hyde Park" than he was when we last had the pleasure of meeting him in the pages of this serial.

The Cornhill.—We approach this periodical with the diffidence with which a quiet, middle-aged gentleman offers homage to the brilliant and acknowledged belle of a ballroom. There is no denying the blaze of charms which surround her, but one inevitably finds oneself considering and debating how much of it is real and how much factitious. May it be allowed us to say that here we are conscious of a title all gathered from the glitter of jewellery, and even from a soupçon of rouge? Nevertheless, we are willing to yield to the prevailing infatuation, and contest not to examine too closely the origin of the fascination. It seems more than superfluous to dwell ever so briefly on any particular article, as, by force of early publication and enormous circulation, there can be little need of doing what in us lies towards obtaining the suffrages of the reading public for a magazine which, from its peculiar point of view, must be admitted to have no rival. Perhaps, as neither in their titles nor from the addition of the names of the authors, either in the list of contents or as made current by public report, are they likely to receive prompt consideration, we may mention the papers entitled "The National Gallery Difficulty Solved" and "Ancient Life in Scotland" as those which appear to have attracted the most attention, and which are likely to receive prompt consideration. The latter is from the pen of Dr. Daniel Wilson, the author of "Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," and is a most valuable contribution to the literature of the subject. The paper on "Ancient Life in Scotland" is, we think, fuller of matter than those on the same subject which have preceded it. Mr. Lever's Let on the Budget is a guarantee for an examination of the financial plan of the Ministry on orthodox commercial principles. It is curious to learn from the article "On the Wine Duties" how very considerable has been the diminution of drinking as a national habit in this country, and, as regards wine more especially, the cessation of a class of persons who were called three and four bottle men that had a very great effect in that diminution. The Eclectic has this month found a series of subjects which are in peculiar accordance with the tone of the periodical.—Colburn's New Monthly is as various as usual.—Bentley's Miscellany revels in fiction, more or less accredited, but has a very suggestive argument on the Budget, conveyed with sly power in the second letter of "M. Victor Gonache" in "Outremanche Correspondence;" and, as usual, the feature of the National is the Parliamentary Sketch, and this month Mr. Roebuck is taken off to a nicety. The Art-Journal gives us engravings of Mulready's "Misery," of "The Madonna di San Sisto" of Raphael, and Wehnert's (a living Belgian artist) "Cow Doctor," from the Royal Collection. We have also to notice with approbation the effort towards a peculiar mission which are made by the Englishwoman's Journal; and to announce that the current monthly number of the Welcome Guest which we have received enables us to say that, so far from there being any falling off in the periodical, there are decided marks of progress. Mr. Lever's "One of Them" is not accelerated a stage, for the story does not make any sensible progress, but there is a palpable weaving of those complications from which the interest is hereafter to be derived.

BUST OF THE RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.

THE bust of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, of which we give an Engraving, was modelled by Mr. Alex. Munro about five years ago, and is a happy moment, when the sum of a gigantic free-trade budget, in face of a ten-million deficit, were not upon his mind. Capital as a likeness, it does equal justice to the right honourable gentleman's statesmanlike qualities, and to his cultivated taste in all branches of literature and art. The simplicity of the treatment is consistent with the eminently practical and straightforward character of the distinguished original. It may be interesting to add that Mr. Gladstone, a liberal patron of art, gave the young sculptor the commission in marble for his first work, the group of Francesca and Rimini, exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1852, and of which an Engraving appeared at that time in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

NORMAN TOWER, BURY ST. EDMUNDS.

THIS magnificent and perfect specimen of Norman work was probably erected by Abbot Baldwin, and is mentioned by Joceline de Brakeland; and Mr. Tymms, in his "History of Bury," describes it as a quadrangular building of four stories, with flat buttresses at each angle, and is crowned with an embattled parapet. The north-west buttress is pierced with semicircular-headed loopholes, to give light to the circular stone staircase. The plinth of the tower is five feet six inches below the level of the road, and marks the height to which the roads have been raised since its erection—the accumulation of seven centuries. The tower is in height, from the plinth to the parapet, 86 feet, and in area 36 feet. The walls, six feet in thickness, are of rubble and boulder, and faced with ashlar of Barnack stone. The four stories are shown by horizontal fascias or stringcourses of varied mouldings, which go uniformly round the four sides—the first, observe, having a moulding; the second, plain nebule corbel-table; and the third, plain tile moulding.

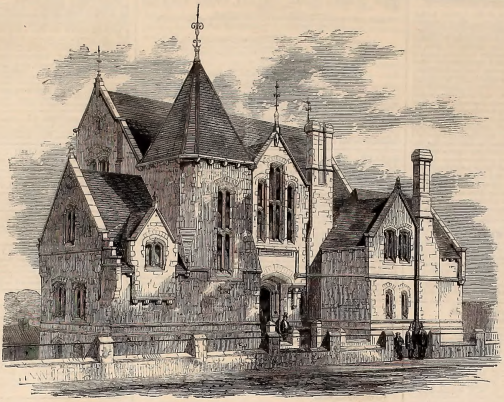
In the lower story is an archway, lofty and wide, and in the centre of the south wall is the western entrance, being a Norman transom doorway, the lintel of which is one block of solid stone. The principal entrance under the archway is to the north, having a beautiful and elaborate receding arch, with an angular pediment projecting from the surface of the tower about five feet, supported on three pillars or a triplicate column on each side, and the impostas of the arch are plain, with the exception of the outer one, which exhibits a double-rolled billet. The bases are bold and plain, the capitals cushion-shaped and plain, with the astragal of the triple columns, which are sculptured—one a cable moulding, and each of the other a

The above is extracted from Mr. Tymms's account, as given in Yates's History of Bury." The tower is now used in conjunction with St. James's Church as a magnificent ring of ten bells. The whole was restored (being then in a most dangerous and dilapidated state) in 1856, under the superintendence and care of the late Mr. Cottingham, with the greatest anxiety to preserve it in its pristine state.

Our Engraving is from a photograph by J. D. Piper, of Halifax and Ipswich.

OFFICES AND SALE ROOMS IN MINCING-LANE.

WITHIN the last quarter of a century the aspect of the city of London has very greatly altered; but perhaps the change in the habits of its population is more striking than its material changes, as is well known, the great city merchant, or merchant prince, had his residence associated with his place of business. At a more recent period, and after the habit of living over the shop, or near his domicile, a managing clerk with his family occupied the stately old rooms, and the dwelling-house was let out in lodgings or sold to the vicinity. At the present time, however, owing to the facilities afforded by omnibus and railway, the clerks and warehousemen prefer to be lodged at a cheaper rate and with more comfort in the suburbs, the state of things no longer exists, and those who have not passed through the city streets on Sunday, or after six o'clock on working days, can scarcely realise the sense of desolation which their appearance causes in contrast to the busy hum of business hours. The enormously increased trade of the City has seconded the facilities of omnibus and railway in diminishing the resident population, inasmuch as the demand for offices and counting-house accommodation in the best commercial situations is so great, that a single room will not unfrequently realize as high a rental as an entire suburban house. From time to time, as the leases of houses have fallen in, the owners have adopted (from the case of business) and for a long time such adaptations supplied the increasing demand—great and important firms conducting their world-wide commerce in places but little fitted for their requirements. We are glad, however, to find that this fashion is now changing; and that, if it is not considered that a place of business should be a structure for the display of art, it is at all events recognised that it should be perfectly adapted to its purpose, and that the health and comfort of those who pass so large a portion of their time within its walls should be studied in respect of light, space, and ventilation.



The edifice No. 9, Mincing-lane, has been erected by Mr. Lewis Glenton, upon land belonging to the Grocers' Company, expressly as offices and sample-rooms for merchants, colonial brokers, and firms having similar business to transact, and who find in the building a choice of upwards of two hundred offices. It is entered from Mincing-lane, and a handsome corridor, lighted with a semi-domed iron roof from the sky, at intervals of about thirty feet, extends through its entire length to an exit into Tower-street, giving ready access to the docks, Custom House, and riversides. The general arrangement of the plan is that of four blocks of building, divided one from the other by an area about fifteen feet wide, which gives light and air to the windows of both sides. The area at the level of the ceiling of the ground floor is covered with glass, which gives a skylight to all the offices on the ground floor. The area for light running north and south, a skylight has been constructed by which light is admitted from the north only—a matter of very great importance in the exhibition of sugar and rice and other colonial produce, as it sheds at all times a uniform amount of light upon the articles spread out upon the counter below.

Each of the four blocks of building above referred to has a spacious stone staircase leading to the upper floors. The upper story of all is covered with a glass roof, similar to that just now described to the ground floor, and is prepared for the exhibition of indigo and similar produce. The first and second floors are similar to the ground floor, except that the rooms are lighted by windows instead of skylight; but, as it is anticipated more space for the exhibition of samples will be required than is furnished upon the ground floor, the windows have been made of wrought iron, with the upper part projecting about eighteen inches, giving that amount of skylight under each. The jewels remind us of the great cistern at Constantinople, with its supposed thousand columns. It is constructed for the reception of wine or drugs. As the object in constructing this building has been to obtain every possible atom of light, and as at the same time strength was an essential element of consideration, the construction is somewhat novel. The whole building is of stone, brick, iron, and incombustible material, except floor-boards and matters of furnishing detail, and it is considered impossible, even if the contents of one room were ignited, that the fire could extend to another.

The façade to Mincing-lane shown in our Illustration is executed in Portland stone, and the object sought to be attained has been an expression of substantial dignity suited to the importance of the trade to which it is devoted rather than a meretricious use of decorative features. In no case has utility given way to architectural effect. The piers are the least in size to contain the flues they hold and give the requisite strength. The windows, without regard to their shape, are of the utmost size it was practicable to make them; while the cornice above is free from that amount of projection which a rigid adherence to precedent would have dictated, but the following of which would have caused shadow. The entrance doorway is of noble proportions, and the carving over it deserves special mention. It has two allegorical figures, representing by the male figure the West, and by the female the East, Indies: each of these figures is associated with articles of commerce the produce of India. The centre is occupied by the shield of the Grocers' Company, surrounded by a wreath of Oriental vegetation: the whole is covered by a palm-tree. This work, as well as the rest of the stone carving, has been executed in a very free and artistic manner by Mr. Toulmie, of Belvedere-road, Lambeth. The entrance-gates are of elaborate design, and are partly wrought and partly cast iron, manufactured by Messrs. Cottam and Co., of Winsley-street. The works have been carried out by Mr. John Bland, as builder; the architect being Mr. John Whichcord, F.S.A.

The rapidity with which this structure has been erected affords a striking example of the building resources in these days. The large use of iron, in place of bulky material requiring time to consolidate, together with the employment of hydraulic cements, enable important buildings, at trifling increased cost, to be erected in a firm and substantial manner, almost without regard to time. The building in question was not commenced until April, 1859, and the old houses, occupying the site of the block in Mincing-lane, were standing in October of the previous year.

STREET ARCHITECTURE.—OFFICES AND SALE-ROOMS IN MINCING-LANE, CITY.

LOWER NORWOOD WORKING MEN'S INSTITUTE.

A BUILDING has been erected, at the expense of Mr. Arthur Anderson, of Lower Norwood, for the use of the Working Men's Institute of that district. It was inaugurated on Monday, the 19th of December last, by two public meetings—one of them held under the presidency of Sir Thomas Philips, chairman of the Society of Arts, at two o'clock, and the other in the evening, when Mr. Anderson himself presided over a crowded and highly-delighted assemblage. This institute is an example of the success which may be confidently expected when sound plans are carefully and indefatigably carried out into action. It is bonâ fide a working men's institution; its affairs are under the general direction of working men; and it is doing a vast amount of good in many different ways amongst the working men of Lower Norwood. Mr. Franks, the president, has largely contributed to the accomplishment of the present success of this institution, and to its being now in a position which promises still more important and more gratifying results in time to come; and the munificent aid rendered by Mr. Anderson, who has provided a building for the institute entirely at his own cost, has enabled the committee to devote their full energies to the development of their plans for the intellectual, social, and moral amelioration of their neighbourhood. The building itself (from designs by Mr. Lamb) claims more than a passing notice, as a really noble example of open-handed liberality. It is both admirably adapted for its purpose by the excellence and completeness of its arrangements, and also is a felicitous instance of the applicability of Gothic architecture to existing requirements.

The net profit realised at the Crystal Palace last year amounted to £45,315 10s. 8d., equivalent to 7½ per cent on the capital of this Company—viz., £600,000.
The site selected for the Palace of the People possesses peculiar advantages for the erection of such a building. It is on the Line of the Great Northern Railway, within a quarter of an hour's journey from King's-cross, and from its elevated position it commands extensive and beautiful views, in all directions. The local population, within a radius of six miles, exceeds one million and a half of persons.
Passengers by the London and North-Western, Midland, Great Western, and Eastern Counties Railways will reach the Palace without traversing the streets of London; and the trains of the Blackwall, North London, and Metropolitan Railways will convey visitors every quarter of an hour from Fenchurch-street, Farringdon-street, Paddington, and the intermediate Stations. The works on the Metropolitan Railway are already commenced, and are expected to be completed before the opening of the Palace.
The estate secured for the purposes of the Company consists of about 450 acres of the finest land in the county of Middlesex, well supplied with water, thoroughly drained, and interspersed with ornamental timber. It is intended to appropriate 150 acres to the palace and grounds. A reserve of 30 acres will be made in favour of benevolent institutions, connected with Art, Science, Literature, Music, Horticulture, and the Railway interest. The remainder of the Estate (about 270 acres) is admirably adapted for the erection of Suburban Villas.
It is impossible to estimate the value which this surplus land will ultimately realise in consequence of the construction of the Palace and of the Branch Railway running through it, whereby direct access will be secured to the heart of London, over the Great Northern and Metropolitan Lines.
Applications for Shares and Prospectuses may be addressed to the Directors, at the Offices of the Company, No. 61, Gresham House, Old Broad-street, City, where the Designs of the Building can be inspected; or to Lewis H. Haslewood, Esq., Stockbroker, 7, Lothbury, E.C.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1860.

NOBODY that we have heard of has adduced any reason why the Reform Bill which has been introduced by her Majesty's Government should not pass. Blessed is the country, says the sage, which has no history, and equally happy is the measure which, at the same time has no termagant objectors and no enthusiastic encomiasts; for men not only do not objurgate that which does no violence to their wishes and feelings, but they are not apt to launch into praise of that which ministers gently and almost imperceptibly to those wishes and feelings. The Reform Bill is an advance in the right direction. It is not denied that it adds very considerably to the franchise, and that in a manner which is calculated to preserve its constitutional character, which is obvious enough. For instance, admitting that it is judicious to fix the limit within which boroughs should be allowed to return only one member at a population of 7000, it would not be difficult to make a more equitable selection than that which those constituencies which just exceed that limit, and which, therefore, are still entitled to be represented by two members, by enlarging their area, something on the plan which has been adopted with regard to the grouping of Scotch towns. The same result might be done in this way to meet an objection against the fixing of the occupation franchise in counties at £10, which excludes a number of persons who are equally qualified for and entitled to votes as those who will possess a like franchise in boroughs. Again, there seems to be reason to suppose that the claims of some of our large towns to immediate representation have not been sufficiently recognised, and that some of the seats which have been appropriated to counties, or parts of counties, might more fairly be made available for this purpose.

Certainly, we are inclined to think that the two of the four seats which are now in abeyance by the disfranchisement of Sudbury and St. Albans, and which are to undergo the process of resurrection, which have been appropriated to Ireland might have been more profitably utilised in this way. Probably few will be found to grudge a third member to Glasgow and a representative to the Universities of Scotland, to which purpose the other two seats thus available are to be applied; but we are disposed to think that, as a general rule, there are not a great many persons who desire to see any addition to the representation of Ireland in the House of Commons, unless, indeed, that provision of the Irish Reform Bill which enables Peers of Ireland to become representatives of constituencies in their own country should be accepted. In that case it is probable that some compensation would be received for the allotting of the two seats to the sister country; and we can conceive that the complacency with which any Secretary for Ireland would view the proposed dissolution of the representation of that part of her Majesty's dominions which would inevitably ensue.

However, all matters of detail are open to future consideration, and, looking to the spirit in which the measure has been framed and brought forward, it is not likely that any modifications and improvements which may be suggested will meet with any obstruction on the part of the Government. Without exactly applying the axiom of the vendor of cutlery who declared that his razors were only made to sell to the policy which has guided the drawing up of the Reform Bill, we may at least venture to assert that it has been constituted with a very decided view to its passing, and there is very little doubt that it will pass. If it disposes of the question of Parliamentary Reform for, say, ten years, why, as far as the present generation is concerned, it seems as if that is a very sufficient merit.

The interruption to the Budget, and the consequent debates have been the leading Parliamentary incidents of the week. Among matters of minor interest we are glad to chronicle another defeat which has been sustained by Sir Thomas Wilson—(what splendid annuities his pertinacity must confer on his legal advisers and agents!)—and Hampstead-heath is still, like Kent, inviolate. Lord Fermoy and the other metropolitan members who opposed the bill deserve the best thanks of the Londoners; and if we are bound in charity to find a reason for the vote of the member for Greenwich, who supported the effort at encroachment, we must suppose that he thought the ne of Kent Jury-bakeries for the holiday-maker than that of Hampstead. We can find no other justification. The election of the Irish Attorney-General for Cork county, in the face of the most desperate opposition by the Ultramontanes, does honour to the union of the Catholics and Protestants against the Papists. The majority was a magnificent one, and shows how little root the Ultramontane doctrines have in the hearts of the best classes in the sister island. To cover the disgrace, the beaten party are making a clamorous effort to get a petition to help the Pope to hire soldiers who may re-enact Perugia. Another seat is vacant, Worcester, by the retirement of Mr. Lindsay. The election into the Dover election, on the petition of Admiral Jurien de la Gravière and Lord Clinton, is the most interest, there being "high people" among the witnesses; and official secrets among the disclosures.

Sardinia's reply to France upon the subject of Tuscany is a very dignified one. The King can be influenced only by the will of the people themselves, to whose decision the question is referred. If they pronounce for autonomy (needless Greek for "self-government"), that decision must be final; but Sardinia will not plead go itself nor to object to another sharing in the vote pronounced.

Peerage arrangements, however proper or expedient, do not usually excite any very large amount of public interest; but there are few persons who will not derive satisfaction from hearing that her Majesty has been pleased to confer on that one title, whose owner is honoured wherever his name is known, shall never run the danger of extinction. At what, we trust, is the remote date when Lord Brougham shall have done with earthly titles, his peerage will be transmitted to his brother, Mr. William Brougham. Whether regarded as a mark of favour to the illustrious representative of philanthropist, or as a recognition of the feelings of the country, which would be ill inclined to see his title (as nobly borne as it has been) pass to be numbered among the things of the past, this act of the Sovereign will be received with universal approval.

Mr. Brougham is a worthy recipient of the honour of being nominated his great brother's heir. We may add that Mr. Brougham married to the sister of Sir Charles Taylor, his issue, so that there is now no barrier to the possibility of the name of Brougham and Vaux passing from our Libro d'Oro.

It is exactly four years since Covent-garden Theatre was destroyed by a fire that originated at a vulgar masquerade got up by a juggler. The Covent Garden Ball, as Punch says, "shook the rubbish from her mounting brow," and, like the London he celebrated,

> More great than ever now, and more august,
> Now glorified, she from her fires does rise,
> Her wings are strengthened with the heat they burst,
> And, opening into larger parts, she flies.

In this week, which includes the anniversary of the Andersonian conflagration, the completing feature of the new edifice has been inaugurated, and Covent Garden, with its new six thousand persons, were present. The volunteers assembled "from all parts of the kingdom, and in the morning the officers paid their homage to their Sovereign: in the evening a large muster met at a banquet; and at night the theatre was filled "to a goodly concourse of the fairest dames," in the new Floral Hall. The theatre of March, 1856, has been nobly repaired, and its memory may now be consigned to oblivion. When the tardy operations on the new street that is soon to connect Covent Garden with Leicester-square shall be finished, this part of London will present a magnificent whole which it is not often given to a district to attain twice. And, while mentioning that street, which crosses Rose-alley, the spot where the poor English poet whom verse we have quoted was assaulted and wounded by ruffians in the employ of a more ruffianly courtier, let us express a hope that those with whom the nomenclature of the street may rest will confer upon it the evidently appropriate name of Dryden-street.

An important step has been taken at assizes. A Catholic priest receives a stolen watch and hands it to the police. A man is accused of having stolen this watch, and the priest is summoned to give evidence on the trial. He admits having received the watch, but declines to come to him for information on confession he will not disclose the source whence he obtained it. The Judge, Mr Justice Hill, very properly replies that a court of law knows nothing about church rules, and that if a man has stolen property in his possession and refuses to account for it he must take the consequences. The priest, still rebellious, is ordered into custody. It is perfectly clear to all but the superstitious that the great compact made with society by a citizen—this clergyman for instance—in exchange for the position of law and the many advantages of a community, condemns as disloyal to that compact any engagement which prevents the citizen from obeying the law. A Protestant clergyman was not long since brought to trouble for holding by the ecclesiastical view of such things; and this modification of the question now satisfied with the result. An imperium in imperio is intolerable;—obey, or withdraw.

We are glad to observe that the proposal to divide the bishopric of Rochester, and constitute a bishopric at St. Albans, is finding favour with the authorities of the Church, and is under consideration. Dr. Vaughan's refusal of the mitre of Gundulphus is to be regretted; but there will be compensation if the delay should have enabled the Minister to apply himself to the question of the division, which is a question of vital importance, as will be admitted when the number of benefices to be "overlooked" by the Bishop of Rochester is taken into account. To make it possible for every member of the Episcopal Bench really to administer his diocese should be the aim of every true friend of the Church of England.

The personalty, now being sworn under £6000, he has devised to his wife, Mrs. Sarah Moorsom, Ward, Esq., of Flowden-buildings, Temple, the other executor. Personalty £50,000. He has devised all his real estate to his said brother Robert, and has bequeathed his personal estate between his said brother and his eldest son by his wife (one of the Rev. IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

THE TREATY WITH FRANCE.—The Duke of NEWCASTLE gave notice that, in the event of the address to the Queen on the subject of the treaty with France being agreed to in the House of Commons, he should propose a similar address to her Majesty, if possible, on Friday next; or, in the event of the debate in the Commons being adjourned over Monday, he should have announced his intention to oppose the address. Monday was ultimately fixed as the day on which the address should be moved.

The Stock Exchange Companies Bill was read a third time and passed, and the sale of Prussian Rifles was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

THE FRENCH TREATY AND THE COLONIES.—Lord J. RUSSELL stated, in reply to a question from Mr. Hankey, that the provisions of the French treaty did not apply to any colony of France except that of Algeria; and that, consequently, goods shipped for Bourbon, Martinique, &c., would not be admitted on the same terms as if consigned to France. He was not aware that any formal expression of a hope that at a long time would elapse before all the French colonies would be added to the privileges of those of Algeria. He was aware of the impression of some persons in the House and Lord said that the Government of France were not disposed to exclude the introduction of rum should be removed.

THE TREATY OF COMMERCE WITH FRANCE.

Lord PALMERSTON moved that the orders of the day be postponed until after Mr. Byng had moved his motion on that subject on the motion of Mr. Bernard said he had been favoured with the terms of the proposed address; but as he opposed it he did not feel bound to give notice of it. Mr. Pitt, the Government had done so without bearing in mind the difference in the circumstances of the two periods.

Mr. S. FITZGERALD declared himself dissatisfied with the language used by the Secretary for Foreign Secretary in reference to the treaty. It was rhetoric then of dignified and firm remonstrance. The project of the Emperor of the French was dangerous to the peace and the best interests of Europe, and against it the great Powers were bound to unite in a determined opposition. Now, on the contrary, instead of a remonstrance on the commercial treaty ought not, in his opinion, to be agreed to until a declaration could be obtained from the Government of France as to what they proposed to do with Savoy? If the right hon. gentleman the member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) promoted the address which Mr. Fitzgerald he had adopted a course of which a great party ought to be ashamed.

After a few words from Mr. Cobden,

Mr. CROMPTON questioned the discretion of Mr. Fitzgerald, and deprecated the use of language which might lead to the creation of ambitious feelings in the two countries.

Mr. BRIGHT said that, as belonging to no party, but simply representing an English constituency, he had to consider first and foremost how the interests of this country were to be best advanced. Looking at the treaty, he regret, he wished to be on the most friendly relations with France; at the same time it must be remembered that the power which, by the treaty, was about to consolate a treaty of commerce had himself broken treaties, and now wished to appear on terms of friendship with us. He was not going to disregard and dishonourable act. He did not fear Napoleon, but he feared that it should be the part of Europe that we were going to trust to enable us to him. The man who, for geographical reasons, wished to appropriate Savoy had also, for geographical reasons, wish to annex the Rhine Provinces of Prussia, and ultimately incline Belgium in his grasp. He approved of the language of Lord John Russell in reference to the annexation of Savoy; but he was of opinion that the address to the Crown ought not to be agreed to until a satisfactory explanation should be given on the part of the subject.

Lord J. RUSSELL deprecated the repetition day after day of those irritating discussions, and invited the Opposition to move a vote of censure at once if they were dissatisfied with the conclusion of the commercial treaty. The cession of the French had declared that he would not proceed to the annexation of Savoy without consulting the Powers of Europe; and Mr. Disraeli (Mr. Bussell's) persuasion was that if the language of disapproval were heard from the House, the French would not proceed. He was not aware that he had stated in.

Mr. BUNTINGE expressed his opinion that the treaty was a great mistake, and that the majority of the public were decidedly opposed to it.

The motion of Lord Palmerston was then, after some further conversation, withdrawn.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The House then went into Committee on the Customs Acts, and the remaining resolutions were passed, with the exception of those relating to paper and hops.

In Committee of Ways and Means the resolution for giving drawback on spirits to rectifiers and distillers was agreed to.

The Speaker informed the House of the receipt of the Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Investments Bill. He explained the object of the Bill, which was to enable persons in savings banks to get the claim from the Exchequer repayment of their advances, and to limit the power of the Commissioners for the National Debt to apply the money in banks and of friendly societies to meet deficiency bills without the direct authority of Parliament. Mr. HUNT moved the second reading of the Bill; but said he thought it might be improved in Committee.—After some remarks from Mr. Ayrton and Mr. Hankey, the Bill was read a second time.

Mr. WHITESIDE moved the second reading of the Settled Estates Bill.—Mr. DUNN moved that it be read a second time that day six months.—After a few words from the Solicitor-General, the Bill was read a second time.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE moved the second reading of the Dwellings of Labourers (Ireland) Bill, the object of which is to give tenants for life power to erect dwellings for the purpose of better providing for the labouring poor. After some remarks from Lord Redesdale, the bill was read a second time.

Lord CHELMSFORD moved the second reading of the Attorneys and Solicitors Bill, which he explained.

After some remarks from Lord ELLENBOROUGH put a question which elicited from the Duke of NEWCASTLE the fact that the Government had made known to Russia, Austria, and Prussia, their views of the proposed annexation of Nice and Savoy, by forwarding to them copies of despatches addressed by Lord John Russell to Lord Cowley.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE.—Mr. KINGLAKE gave notice that on Monday next he would move an humble address to her Majesty, thanking her Majesty for having caused to be present to the House the correspondence relative to the annexation of Savoy and Nice to France, as well as the treaties of peace and amity, and alliance and friendship, presented on the 16th of January; and humbly expressing to her Majesty the deep concern with which the House had heard of the contemplated annexation of Savoy and Nice, and assuring her Majesty of the satisfaction with which the House would learn that her Majesty had invited the other Powers which were parties to those treaties to join her in endeavouring to prevent the realisation of a project which had excited the distrust and alarm of Europe.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.—Mr. HORSMAN gave notice that on the motion for an address to the Crown in reference to the French treaty he should move additional words, "that, in the opinion of the House, while it imposed no necessary and impolitic restrictions upon the Crown and Legislature to which the House could not assent, and which they prayed her Majesty not to assent to.

Sir J.—Mr. H. BERKELEY renewed his annual notice of motion on the subject of the ballot for the 22nd instant.

SALE AND PURCHASE OF COMMISSIONS.

Sir DE L. EVANS called attention to the address he presented to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to order the gradual abolition of the purchase and sale of commissions in the commissioned ranks of the Army (having due regard, in doing so to existing rights), with the view of establishing in lieu thereof a system of promotion based on the principle, partly seniority, grounded on war services of merit, length of colonial and home service, and on the attainment of certain standards of military science as her Majesty shall be pleased to direct." The hon. and gallant officer, who was loudly cheered on rising to his hand, was understood to say that, as a first step, the Government should abolish purchase in the case of Majors and Lieutenant-Colonels. He was aware that it would be necessary to expend £97,000 for the first year, after which the sum would gradually diminish year by year; it would be a wise expenditure.

Mr. RICH seconded the motion.

Captain VIVIAN moved an amendment, "That, whereas the promotion in the seniority corps already existing,—the Royal Artillery, Royal Engineers, and Royal Marines,—is regulated by considerations which this House is of opinion should be extended to the whole military system in the Army, this House is of opinion that it is expedient to abolish by the purchase system in the regiments of the line, and that an address be presented to her Majesty to that effect." He submitted that in opposition to the motion he was not opposing the principle of promotion by merit. He thought that the true system was that of the seniority test, and that no adoption would seriously injure the efficiency of the Army. The abolition of purchase would lead to having all officers in the Army, for the only vacancies then would be occasioned by death, and no officer would be promoted over the head in order to make way for younger men. He denied that the present system encouraged professional study. Lord Cardigan and Lord Raglan's first "would find that for one Plantagenet there were fifty Browns, Joneses, and Robinsons." He thought that the Government, in proposing to abolish himself was the best answer to his own argument, for he was advanced solely by the purchase system from the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel to that of Colonel in the space of six months without the expenditure of a single shilling. The Duke of Wellington had declared that the system of Sir De L. Evans's motion according to their own notions of what was best for their own interests. He (Captain Vivian) did not think that such arrangements as would secure their peace and prosperity.

Mr. BELL, in a maiden speech, was sure to be cheered by Mr. Alderman Salomons, Mr. Cowper said the bill was cracked in no less than five places, but whether that was sufficient to justify the Government in flying in the tenacity of the bill, or the metal being too brittle for the capacity of the hammer, he would not undertake to say.

The WHITESIDE RIDLE.—Mr. W. KOREYON asked the Secretary of State for War whether it was intended to abolish the Royal Military Asylum and devote its revenue to the Enfield establishment to the production of rifles on his own principle of construction; and, if so, whether he had any objection to state the reasons why; and whether any calculation had been made of the probable cost of the Enfield rifle when it was put in the Enfield establishment?—Mr. S. HERBERT said such an offer had been made to him, but he declined it, on the ground of the large sum that would be incurred in carrying out the proposal.

CUSTOMS REGULATIONS.—Mr. HANKEY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intended to propose for the acceptance of the House the Customs Acts Consolidation Resolutions and No. 1, 2, and 3 of the Ways and Means Resolutions; and, if so, whether he was prepared to state with what modifications he intended to propose them?—The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that, with respect to resolutions 12 and 13, he would move that the duties on fish should be exempted from Customs' duties. As regarded resolutions 1 and 2, he hoped to be able to lay them before the House in a day or two. He intended to propose that the duties on tea should be reduced to 1s. 6d. per lb.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. BYNG moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty to assure her Majesty that, having considered the treaty of commerce concluded between her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, this House begs leave to approach her Majesty with their sincere and grateful acknowledgments for having caused the same to be communicated to them; and to express their satisfaction at the building trade, and the House should have more time for its consideration before it was asked hon. members to vote it.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. BYNG moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty to assure her Majesty that, having considered the treaty of commerce concluded between her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, this House begs leave to approach her Majesty with their sincere and grateful acknowledgments for having caused the same to be communicated to them; and to express their satisfaction at the prospect of the blessings of peace." This honourable gentleman, in the course of his speech, described the foreign policy of the Government which he said, was based upon conciliation and non-interference, and argued that the treaty of commerce would be the means of placing the two countries more closely together in the bonds of friendship and united interests. He hoped that those who were about to abstain from voting would express their opinions in the shape of an amendment to displace the Government who had negotiated it. He (Mr. E. Baines) thought that the treaty ought not to be impugned upon any substantial ground, he exhorted the House to be unanimous in giving its assent to the treaty which the Throne with a cordial address approving of the treaty (Cheers).

Mr. E. BAINES supported the motion, and bore testimony to the fact that all the commercial interests of the country had given their sanction to the treaty. Lord John Russell, in his despatch of the 23rd of January, spoke to Northern Germany, with a much less reprobation than France, our exports exceeded £21,000,000. The Government of France had, on the contrary, set to remove this vile disproportion, and to give great strides to the intercourse between the two countries.

Mr. LINDSAY said he had given notice of the addition of the following words:—"While, however, this House is willing to believe that the Emperor of the French in the adoption of the beneficial principles of trade which he recently established, was actuated to use liberal principles extended by a treaty of navigation, which should enable us to carry out more effectually the intercourse between the two countries." He (Mr. Lindsay) would pray that her Majesty will adopt such measures as may appear best calculated to carry out the principles of free trade. He (Mr. Lindsay) would offset the abolition of all differential duties on the trade carried on in British and French vessels between the ports of the two countries, without their respective colonies and dependencies, and from port to port within those limits. He (Mr. Lindsay) gentlemen had hardly approved of the treaty so far as it went, he would throw no obstacle in the way of its adoption, and would therefore not move the amendment of which he had given notice for another evening.

Mr. GREGORY did not object to the Government making attempts to convert France to free trade, but he contended that a system of bargaining and chopping was not the proper way to bring about that object.

Besides, the present time was not one to sacrifice £21,000,000 of wine duties for the sake of accomplishing an object that might possibly be given, but was by no means certain. He denied that the advantages of the treaty were all on one side.

Mr. CLAY supported the treaty.

Mr. BRIGHT supported the motion which he considered would tie us down for ten years to a nation, in the ruler of which we had no confidence. He (Mr. Bright) was not an enemy to commercial treaties, which he believed was framed in a sound and statesmanlike spirit.

Mr. DISRAELI congratulated the House on its endeavour, by wise and enlightened legislation, to establish the principles of free trade. Happily and entirely approved of the provisions of the free trade policy, which, inaugurated by the late Sir Robert Peel, and carried on by Mr. Cobden, and which, he believed, as illustrated in the present treaty, would prove a great blessing to England and a great boon to the world.

Mr. HUME supported the motion. In reference to the 11th article of the treaty, he contended that France needed our coal for the purposes of her manufactures, and that we could not do without it. As to the last article, Mr. Horsman of our coal-fields being exhausted in a century or two, he could not understand. Coal existed in England for many centuries to come, say 500,000 tons every year, we had supplies which would last 1075 years (Laughter).

Lord ARTHUR VANE TEMPEST said, although he supported the Government in their financial arrangements, he could not vote for the address, believing that the Emperor of the French had evinced a great want of consideration for the feelings of the Court of Turin in the case of Nice. He would, therefore, move as an amendment the following:—"After the word 'that' to add these words:—'This House congratulates her Majesty with great devotion and prospect. Whilst fully appreciating the advantageous results which will accrue from the commercial intercourse between England and France, and estimating the present friendly connection between the two countries, this House is bound to express its sympathy with Sardinia in the present unfortunate position of affairs, and to express its regret that the Emperor of the French in respect to the proposed annexation of Savoy be made known to the House."

Mr. BOVILL seconded the amendment.

Sir E. CAYLEY, having stated his objections to several articles of the treaty, declared notwithstanding that he would vote for the motion, because he believed that the total rejection of the treaty would be attended with greater evil in the present state of affairs than its adoption.

Mr. M. GIBSON expressed his satisfaction at hearing the hon. and learned gentlemen (Sir E. Cayley) say he intended to vote for the address, although he had criticised somewhat severely the terms of the treaty. He concurred with the hon. and learned gentleman in thinking that there were many points in our commercial relations with France which it was still desirable to alter; but this treaty by itself gained many great

SAVOY AND NICE.

In reply to the Earl of CARNARVON, on the subject of Lord Cowley's private letters to Lord J. Russell,

The Duke of NEWCASTLE said the noble Earl must excuse him entering into the question, especially as the subject was sure fully to end up discussion. All he would say at the present moment was, that he did not think that any blame attached either to Lord Cowley or Lord John for not having laid the letters in question. Whether there was anything in those private letters that would alter the case as it at present stood, he was not prepared to form an opinion. But he could assure the noble Earl that Parliament had before it frankly and fully the whole of the case as it at present stood.

Lord CAMPBELL said he had thought such an important subject as that of the annexation of Savoy to France ought not to have been treated for a moment as a private matter.

Earl GREY thought that without the whole of the correspondence on this subject was produced Parliament would be in a great extent precluded from fully and properly discussing the question.

Lord WODEHOUSE said that was certainly was not in existence any important communication, as seemed to be supposed, from Count Walewski.

The conversation then dropped.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—THURSDAY.

Mr. Serjeant Deasy (the newly-appointed Attorney-General for Ireland) took the oath and his seat on his re-election for the county of Cork.

NOTICE.

Mr. KINGLAKE, at the request of Lord J. Russell, postponed his motion relating to Savoy and Nice from Monday next to Monday, the 28th inst.

Sir J. WALKER asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he would lay on the table the whole of the correspondence on the Government of France relative to the affairs of Italy and the annexation of Savoy, which had taken place since the 1st day of the last session of the Parliament?

Lord J. RUSSELL said that the correspondence in question was prepared, and he would be able to lay it on the table to-morrow.

POLICY OF MINISTERS REGARDING THE PAPAL TERRITORIES.

Mr. SCHOLEFIELD said he begged to ask the Attorney-General for Ireland whether the Ministers being all Protestants whilst a large proportion of the Queen's subjects professed the Roman Catholic religion of the present Government to observe faithfully the principle of absolute non-intervention, so far at least as regarded the temporal power of the Pope, and the integrity of his States?

Mr. NAPIER could assure the hon. member that the foreign policy of Lord Derby's Government was understood either by the House or the country to be any section of her Majesty's subjects. That policy was founded on the principle of non-intervention. He had already stated, with regard to the affairs of Italy, that the principle which the Government endeavoured to inculcate was that the people of that country were to be no longer kept in darkness according to their own notions of what was best for their own interests. He (Mr. Napier) trusted that the present south arrangements would secure their peace and prosperity.

Mr. BELL, in a maiden speech, was sure to be cheered by Mr. Alderman Salomons, Mr. Cowper said the bill was cracked in no less than five places, but whether that was sufficient to justify the Government in flying in the tenacity of the bill, or the metal being too brittle for the capacity of the hammer, he would not undertake to say.

THE WHITESIDE RIDLE.—Mr. W. CUSTOMS REGULATIONS.—Mr. HANKEY asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intended to propose for the acceptance of the House the Customs Acts Consolidation Resolutions and Nos. 1, 2, and 3 of the Ways and Means Resolutions; and, if so, whether he was prepared to state with what modifications he intended to propose them?—The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that, with respect to resolutions 12 and 13, he would move that the duties on fish should be exempted from Customs' duties. As regarded resolutions 1 and 2, he hoped to be able to lay them before the House in a day or two. He intended to propose that the duties on tea should be reduced to 1s. 6d. per lb.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. BYNG moved that an humble address be presented to her Majesty to assure her Majesty that, having considered the treaty of commerce concluded between her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, this House begs leave to approach her Majesty with their sincere and grateful acknowledgments for having caused the same to be communicated to them; and to express their satisfaction at the prospect of the blessings of peace." He concurred with the hon. and learned gentleman in thinking that there were many points in our commercial relations with France which it was still desirable to alter; but this treaty by itself gained many great advantages both for France and England. He looked upon the objections raised as involving minor points, which should not be allowed to stand in the way of an unanimous declaration on the part of the House in favour of a treaty that was pregnant with the best results to the two great nations that were parties to it (Cheers).

Sir S. Northcote condemned the treaty as an incomplete and a slovenly document; and as regarded the 11th article, relating to coal, handing this country to a certain course of action in regard to France highly dangerous to the national interests.

Mr. Roebuck moved the adjournment of the debate.

Lord Ashley's Factory Bill was withdrew his amendment.

The debate was then adjourned.

The election for the county of Cork terminated in the return of Mr. Alderman Gabriel Denny by a large majority over Viscount Campden.

Mr. Murray died last week at Armagh, aged 113, or more. He was said at a recent age that he remembered the year in which the style was changed, which would have him age at least at 113.

At the Durham Assizes the late clerk to the Hartlepool gas-works pleaded guilty to fifteen years' penal servitude for forgery; and the ex-superintendent of police at Durham, for the same offence on a much smaller scale, has been ordered to be imprisoned for nine months.

The writ for the election of a member to serve in Parliament for Wrexham, in the room of Mr. W. Lindsay, who has vacated the Chiltern Hundreds, was received on Wednesday, and Monday next has been appointed by the sheriff for the nomination.

Drowning of a Thief in the Act of Escaping.—A thief was drowned in the Liverpool docks on Saturday last. Trying to escape from a constable, he jumped into the water, and was drowned. When the body was recovered it was found to be enveloped in thirteen sheets of paper, which he had stolen from the premises of a stationer he robbed were £5 1s. 7d.

Mr. A. W. Todd, the master of the Eskdale hounds, was returning at night from a meet which had taken place at Langholm last Saturday. The night was one of pitchy blackness, and, on passing a bridge about two miles on the Wauchope Road, and which spans a fearful chasm, it is thought his horse must have shied, with a spring against the upper parapet, and pitched the rider right over the bridge, where his mangled corpse was found at eight o'clock.

The Fall of a Schoolhouse at Stockport.—An inquiry into the fall of a building at Stockport, by which one child was killed and several others injured, was opened on Thursday week. The building was used as schoolrooms, and a large number of children were removed from the interior only a few minutes before the roof was blown off by the wind. The architect, contractor, and others connected with the erection of the place, were present, and from the evidence given it appeared probable that the roof had fallen in when the building was being put up, in consequence of the defective way in which the principal timbers of the roof had been set. The jury returned a verdict "Accidental death," coupled with a strong condemnation of the loose manner in which the specifications had been carried out, and the building had been put up.

The Trent and the Confessional.—At the Durham Assizes, on Saturday, Mr. Cuthbert Sharp, a Roman Catholic priest, was called as a witness. He declined to be sworn, and refused to answer a question, but, stating that it was given him in connection with the confessional, he did not feel at liberty to answer. "Such an answer would be a bar to my pension for life, would be violating the laws of the Church as well as the canons of the realm." Mr. Justice Willes said that the witness was not asked to disclose anything said to him in confession, but that he was bound to answer the question put to him. The witness still declined, the Judge committed him for contempt of Court. The prisoner was found guilty of the murder, and sentenced to death.

Free Ale Gallery in Manchester.—The Manchester Guardian informs us that an important step has been taken towards the realisation of Mr. Thomas Bazley's scheme for the establishment of a Free Art Gallery in that city. A highly influential meeting was held on Monday at the Townhall, the Lord Mayor in the chair, when Mr. Bazley and other speakers pointed out the great advantages, moral and intellectual, which would result from the establishment of such a gallery as proposed. All the classes of the population an opportunity of spending at least some portion of their leisure hours in the refining atmosphere of a gallery dedicated to the exhibition of art-treasures. A resolution embodying these views was carried, and a committee was appointed to carry out the object, express effort to raise a fund of £100,000. Lord Derby, Lord Wilton, Lord Ellesmere, and Lord Overstone have contributed £1000 each, and Mr. Heywood's friends has put down £1000 "for the honour and glory of his native town."

Alleged Murder of the Captain and Chief Officer of a Liverpool Ship.—Mr. Thomas Bradbury, a Northumberland pilot, was charged with the wilful murder of the captain and chief officer of the ship Carnarvon, of Liverpool, on the 30th of January last, off the north coast of Lampton by Mr. R. Augustus Cooper, her Britannic Majesty's Consul at Newcastle. Mr. Cooper, in addition to the murder charge, was put on oath, with soldiers and soldiers' wives and children. The conduct of the prisoner during the voyage was described by the witnesses, and substantial evidence is understood to be to the effect that one morning Oseman, who was the steward, was found dead in his cabin, and shortly after the captain and principal officers of the ship perished. The result was that Captain Bradbury was left in charge of the vessel, with the crew, and the boys; and Mr. Carroll, the surgeon, narrowly escaped with his life. The Northumberland magistrates committed the prisoner for trial, and copies of the depositions taken before the Consul in Pernambuco.

A Mutiny.—A serious mutiny prevailed at Nottinghamshire. The particulars of which are thus given in the Manchester Guardian:—On Tuesday week, a cattle-robber, named Charles Spencer, was returning to Walkeringham, where he resided, from Gainsborough, on horseback, in a cart was from his own village, named John and James Fenton (no relation), who, in consequence of some old grudge against him, set out in pursuit. A considerable sum of money, and other property, had been stolen from the house of Fenton, walked on, and Spencer refused to halt. A short time in conversation with the Fentons, and the three commenced a fight. Spencer knocked down both, and, upon his return to the village of his residence, he was fired at. The shot, it would seem, did not produce the desired effect, for Spencer, on his arrival at Walkeringham, was in the most frightful manner, almost severing the head from the body. Various suspicious circumstances point to John Fenton, who has been taken into custody.

A Desperate Encounter with Burglars is thus recorded in the Morning Advertiser:—Between one and two o'clock on Monday Mr. Benjamin Guy, a charter-master in Messrs. Sparrow's coal-field, and residing at Queen's-row, Pentonville, was awakened by a noise at the adjoining his bedroom, bearing a light, and carrying in his other hand a small crowbar. Mr. Guy immediately sprang out of bed, and a desperate struggle ensued in the dark (the light having been extinguished). Mr. Guy following blows with his fists against the face of the burglar, who wielded his crowbar most unmercifully. After this unequal combat had continued for upwards of half an hour, the burglar doing his utmost to escape, a second robber came to his assistance. Fortunately by this time the noise of the struggle had reached the ears of Mr. Guy's wife and son, who, attracted the attention of police-constable Sladden, who came up in time to find the two men in the act of flight. The man who had received the first burglar, who, on being searched at the station, was found to have in his possession a large bunch of keys, a dark lantern, and other housebreaking instruments, and also a quantity of gunpowder and percussion-caps. His companion has not been apprehended. Mr. Guy has received severe injuries about the head and face, and a deep cut in the arm, which is believed to be the work of a knife. The two burglars are described the same as Samuel Jones, stating that he lived at Wolverhampton. He was remanded till Monday next.

WRECK OF THE "HUNGARIAN" AND LOSS OF 200 LIVES.

The mail steamer Hungarian, of Glasgow, belonging to the Allan Steamship Company, was lost on the morning of the 40th ult. on Cape Sable, off the coast of Nova Scotia, and 200 lives were lost. The vessel struck at 4 o'clock in the morning, and disappeared at day-break. By the accounts received, the disaster appears to have been one that was impossible, owing to a heavy sea. The Hungarian left Liverpool for Portland on the 22nd ult., and on the 24th it appears that the chief engineer reported that the passengers and crew numbered together 281. The information has been given by passengers who have arrived at Halifax, and it is barely possible that some of the passengers and crew escaped in the boats.

Foundering of the "Pomona."—Twenty-two Lives Lost.—La Mathe Journal of Tuesday last gives the following:—"A sad catastrophe occurred yesterday morning to the British steamer Pomona, Captain J. B. Pelan, from Hull, for Stettin, of Wexford, between the Scharhorn and Brethen, which left the port on the afternoon preceding, with seven passengers and a crew of twenty-two hands, all told, in connection with the people for London. All went well till midnight, when the wind and sea increased to a heavy storm as to render it impossible to keep the vessel. Finding that he could make no progress from the violence of the weather, and the strong set of the current, the captain resolved to put the vessel back to Hats. When about five miles off the Gore Light, the vessel struck, and increased to an alarming extent, in spite of all efforts to prevent it. It was consequently determined to take to the boat, and the crew, with the two ladies and fourteen of the persons in the boat, two lives being lost in getting on board the brig, owing to the heavy sea; thus making in all a loss of twenty-two lives.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue have addressed a report to the Lords of the Treasury in support of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement that the paper duty "is rapidly becoming untenable."

MUSIC.

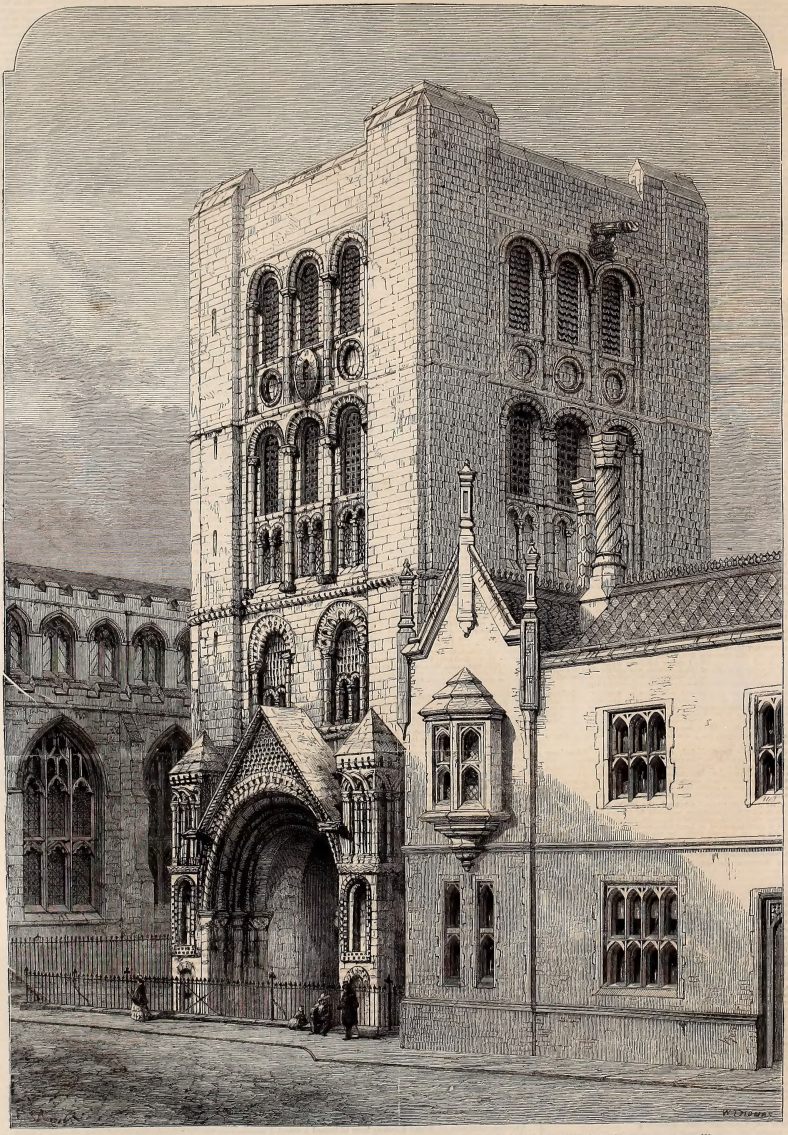
Of our musical theatres there is nothing to say except in the future tense. At Covent Garden, Wallace's "Lurline" continues to draw such great houses that its run will certainly be prolonged to the end of the season. We understand the theatre will close next week. Mr. R. S. Smith has announced that he will open Her Majesty's theatre on the 10th of April. The enterprising lessee makes magnificent preparations of the great things he has in view to revive the fallen fortunes of this once splendid Temple of the Muses. "Time tries all." Meantime he mentions two great names as being included in his future company—our old favourite Alboni, and Madame Borghi Mamo, who at present is the great stall on the Parisian opera stage. Of the Royal Italian Opera we, as yet, hear nothing.

The Monday Popular Concert has been the most remarkable musical performance of this week. The instrumental music was selected from the works of Mozart, including the first and posthumous quartett in F; the septet in E flat, op. 20; the "Sonata Appassionata" the magnificent sonata in A (Kreutzer), and the sonata in A, for the piano and violin, in which Miss Arabella Goddard, accompanied by Herr Becker. Among the vocal pieces was Rosina's air, "Le Pastorelle dell' Alpi," beautifully sung by Miss Parepa, and encored. Sims Reeves was also encored in Purcell's air, "Ah, how sweet it is love," and Mr. Santley, in addition to the great art of English musicians, whose very name, nevertheless, is beginning to be forgotten by his own countrymen. The managers of these concerts cannot be better employed than in bringing back to light the gems of our old English music.

The St. John's Wood Subscription Concert, on Monday evening last, under the direction of Mr. George Forbes, was a highly elegant performance. The programme exhibited an admirable selection of the pianoforte, vocal, and instrumental, by the most eminent foreign and English composers. The instrumentalists were M. Benth, violin; Signor Piatti, concertina; and Mr. George Forbes, pianoforte. The singers were Miss Susanna Cole, Miss Madeline Rose, Miss Mina Poole, Mr. Wrighton, Signor Marras, and the Quartet Glee Union. The whole performance was executed in perfect time. We observe from the announcement that this was the conclusion of the eighth and last season of these concerts; which we regret to hear. St. John's Wood Subscription Concerts have uniformly been excellent, and in all appearance highly successful.

M. Sainton and Madame Sainton Dolby, who, since their marriage, have been sojourning at Paris, gave a concert there on Thursday last week, which was attended by a great concourse of Parisian fashionables, attracted by the reputation of the great English contralto. Miss Dolby—we beg her pardon, Madame Sainton Dolby—sang in a variety of styles, and displayed her charming national ballads, and everything she sang was rapturously applauded. M. Sainton, too, was received with all the honour due to his talents and reputation.

THE THEATRES, &c.



Princess'.—Mr. A Harris, the lessee of this theatre, appeared on Tuesday with considerable success in a character taken from the French piece "Ce que femme veut," and adapted to the genius of "Cruel to be Kind." What particularly struck us in the performance of Mr. Harris in the principal play of expression of distinguished his gesture and action. The part thus acted is named Cravattes Brown, who has a great reluctance to become acquainted with a wealthy widow in search of a husband (Miss C. Lockey), but who forces herself on his attention by purchasing his house and a dishonoured acceptance, and by threatening him with a law-pe generality. An explanation then takes place. The widow was not always so wealthy; she had once, in her distress, helped her with a guinea. Brown now offers her his hand and heart, which are, of course, accepted. There is an underplot, not of much importance. The little piece is thoroughly recast.

Strand.—A farce, under the title of "A Frightful Accident," produced on Monday, depends for its success on a series of practical jokes, with the accompaniment of blows, on the plan of the pantomime. What it has of story only serves for the production of the situations, which consist of a succession of blows, and the most ludicrous attitudes are brought together in a state of ridiculous alarm. Foremost in the row is Mr. Fernandel Scroggs (Mr. Clarke), who fears that his rival will arrive to claim his lady-love, and who, in the belief that he has had one dirted with General Dealer, now in India. Then there is a jealous husband (Mr. Wigan), and a jealous wife (Mrs. W. Mowbray) escapes and comes to court Scroggs's niece: to compel Scroggs's consent to her union he assumes the character of ghost to the General. The same expedient is resorted to by Mr. Robbers (Mr. E. Danvers), the lover of the housemaid, Sally Shudders (Miss Charlotte Saunders). The ghost is discovered in the act of presenting a pistol at both, and then leaps out of a window. Brought back by the police with the ghost's cloak to make showmen for his victims, and grants the wishes of the young men. We should mention that Mr. Robbers makes his entrance from the rail with his clothes, and with a hilarity his remarks are addressed to Under Sally appears with a blackened face, and in her excitement runs against everybody, and begrimes them both. Scroggs hides in the feather bed, and emerges almost smothered with flue and feathers. All these various incidents are received with applause as motives for mirth, and responded to with shrieks of laughter.

St. James's.—A pleasant little piece, with well-pointed dialogue, and well constructed, has been produced at this house with well-merited success. It is entitled "Number Forty-four," and proceeds upon the principle of presenting a play within a play. Mr. Compton, Mr. Mandeville, Mr. Dale, determines on private theatricals, and advertises at No. 49, Strand, for performers. Among these, Mr. Noles (Mr. C. Mathews), his uncle's ward, is spoken of, and authorised to furnish the play. He so contrives that the uncle, who himself acts a part in the amateur piece, should give his niece to her penniless lover. Mr. Compton's performance was highly creditor, now claims a realisation of the pledge from Sir William, who, after much persuasion, consents to his consent. Part of the production of Mr. F. Lawrence, and, though slight in its plot, is superior in its composition. It is very creditable to the management of Miss Wyndham.

Lyceum.—The members of the Savage Club appeared on Wednesday in an amateur performance for a charitable purpose, dividing among themselves the parts in Sheridan's comedy of "The School for Scandal," and a new burlesque on the subject of "The Forty Thieves," written by Mr. Augustus Mayhew. The latter was comprised all the burlesque writers of the day. The performance of the comedy was highly creditable to the performers. Mr. Pyne almost showed a correct appreciation of the character of Sir Peter Teazle, and Mr. J. Crowell Thomas that of Joseph Surface, but in a lower degree of practised skill; while the Moses of Dr. G. L. M. Strauss was really a good and effective piece of acting. The part of Charles Surface was played with spirit by Mr. Henry J. Byron. The brothers Brough, as Sir Benjamin Backbite and Sir Oliver Surface, were intensely droll. The extravagant exaggerations of the burlesque these gentlemen displayed even more spirit, and by their animation provoked the mirth of a boisterous and fast-public audience. A prologue was spoken by Mr. Leicester Buckingham, which was remarkably good. We have only to add that the entertainments were honoured by the presence of the Prince and Princess of Consort, and scene of the Royal family. From the appearance of the house, the purpose of the performance must have been abundantly answered.

The Vindication of Mr. Collier in the "Athenæum".—(To the Editor.)—Save coupe.—In the "Town and Table Talk" of the Illustrated London News of the week before last it is stated that a vindication of Mr. Collier in the matter of the "Annotated Shakspeare," published in the Athenæum of the week preceding, was understood to be written by me. So the favour to set me right with your readers by assuring them that the understanding alluded to was altogether a mistake. I had nothing whatever to do with the article referred to.—I, Bruce, 3, Upper Gloucester-street, Dorset-square, March 3.

THE NORMAN TOWER, BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—BY J. D. PIPER.—IN THE PHOTOGRAPHIC EXHIBITION.—SEE PAGE 228.

CHURCH OF ST. MARY REDCLIFFE, BRISTOL.

AMONGST the parish churches of England, the beautiful edifice of St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, of which we give a south-west View, stands almost unrivalled. In the "Guide to Redcliffe Church" we find that the present church was begun by Sir Simon de Burton, in the year 1292. The body of the church, from the transepts downwards, was not finished till 1377, by William Canynge, sen.; and, according to some ancient MSS., "in 1445, at St. Paul's tide, was very tempestuous weather, by which Redcliffe steeple was overthrown in a thunderclap, doing great harm to the church by the fall thereof; but by the good devotion of Mr. Wm. Canynges it was re-edified to his everlasting praise." The spire has, however, never been replaced, and time has made sad ravages in the good work of Masters Simon de Burton and Canynges; still we rejoice to see that a similar spirit seems to prevail with the Bristol men of the present day, and with a worthy zeal they are endeavouring to preserve this elegant and tasteful pile. A sum of £12,000 has been expended in the work of preservation, under the direction of Mr. George Godwin, F.R.S., and it is supposed that twice that sum will be required to complete the restoration of the church. In the south-west view the south porch may be indistinctly seen through the trees. The restoration of this portion of the fabric has been accomplished by a "commercial society," consisting principally of commercial travellers, who have obtained a large number of small subscriptions for this purpose, and it will be a lasting monument of the good taste and liberality of that body.

The north porch of this church is considered one of the finest specimens of architectural beauty in Europe. The late John Britton said it was unique. It is also interesting in its connexion with that marvellous boy Chatterton, and further because there is what in these matter-of-fact days we so seldom meet with, a pleasing mystery shrouding the progress of its restoration. An offer was made by an anonymous correspondent, signing himself "Nil Desperandum," to provide funds for this work, on condition that no attempt should be made to break through his incognito. This was agreed to, and on the 24th of November, 1848, the first stone was laid, in the presence of Mr. T. Proctor, Mr. W. Powell, D.P.G.M., Mr. W. P. King, Mr. C. B. Hare, Mr. Rice, the mason, and two assistants; and from that time the work regularly proceeded till its completion in June, 1854, at a cost of £2334 8s. 8d. The funds were regularly forwarded by the generous donor, who strictly maintained his incognito.

THE CHURCH OF ST. MARY REDCLIFFE, BRISTOL.

THE ROYAL ENGINEERS' MEMORIAL, CHATHAM.

THIS work of art, of which we present an Engraving, has been designed by Mr. M. Digby Wyatt, the architect, under whose superintendence it is now in progress of erection, to commemorate the officers and sappers of the Corps of Royal Engineers, who fell in the Russian war. The funds from which its cost will be defrayed have been supplied by voluntary subscription throughout the corps, all ranks having cheerfully contributed to ensure a material record of their duty in the late calamitous but glorious campaign in the Crimea. There exists certainly no branch of the service whose value was more profoundly appreciated during that trying period when the Goddess of Victory appeared to be hovering over the conflicting armies, uncertain, as it were, on which to bestow the palm; and it can only be a subject of national gratulation that a fitting monument should be now about to be erected by the noble men who survive to the equally noble men who fell in vindicating their country's cause and the time-honoured prestige of the splendid corps to which they belonged.

The selection of a suitable site was one of the earliest duties of the committee of subscribers, administered by its honorary secretary, Captain the Hon. George Wrottesley, and presided over successively by Colonel Gordon and Colonel Chapman; and it was soon decided that no more eligible position could be devised for the memorial than the centre of the vacant side of the great quadrangle of the Brompton Barracks at Chatham, the head-quarters of the Royal Engineers. Permission for such an appropriation of Government land having been freely accorded by the War Department, who further contributed from the Ordnance stores a quantity of Russian gun-metal, in order to provide material for casting the bronze gates, which formed an important feature in the design, the necessary drawings were prepared, and tenders invited for the execution of the work. These having been received, that of Messrs. Mansfield and Son, of Henry-street, Gray's-inn-road, was found to be the lowest, and they were accordingly intrusted with the contract.

The necessary foundations, inverts, &c., for the purpose of equally distributing the weight of the massive Portland stone, blocks of which the arch will be built having been brought up to the level of the soil, his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Commanding-in-Chief, on the 1st instant laid the foundation-stone with all the ceremonial due to the formal commencement of a work so interesting not only to the special branch of the service commemorated, but to the British Army and the British public at large.

His Royal Highness arrived at the Strood station shortly before twelve o'clock, attended by his Aide-de-Camp, and was received by a guard of honour, selected from the Royal Marines and the East India regiments, the guard being composed of none but men who had served in the Crimea and were decorated with the Crimean medal. Major A. A. Douglas, Royal Marines, commanded the guard, the colours of the Royal Marines being held by Lieutenant Thomas. The Duke proceeded at once to the parisien, and, on arriving at the drawbridge, the guns from the Cornwallis battery fired a Royal salute. The whole of the troops of the garrison, to the number of about 6000 men of all ranks, were drawn up on the parade-ground of Chatham Barracks, under the command of Colonel Jervis, to await the arrival of the Duke of Cambridge, and his Royal Highness, having spent a short time in inspecting the men, proceeded to perform the ceremony of the day. In order to give effect to the proceedings, very extensive preparations had been made, every inch of the lofty scaffolding used in the building of the memorial was covered with flags, while from four lofty poles were displayed the colours of England, France, Sardinia, and Turkey, the nations which fought together in the Crimea. Above the scaffold was placed the word "Crimea" in branches of laurel. On each side of the stone were galleries for the accommodation of ladies, the general public, among whom the gay uniforms of nearly two hundred officers were conspicuous, being admitted in the space round the stone. The approaches were lined on each side by the troops of the Royal and Indian Engineers. On his Royal Highness reaching the barracks he was received with a general salute, the band playing the National Anthem. The ceremony commenced by the Rev. Mr. Green, senior Chaplain of the garrison, offering up an appropriate prayer; after which Mr. D. Wyatt presented his Royal Highness with a photographic view of the proposed memorial, together with the plans, which the Duke of Cambridge spent some time in inspecting. A silver trowel was then handed to his Royal Highness, with which he spread the mortar, after which the stone, which was decorated with laurel, was lowered to its place, the Royal Engineers' band playing "Sleepers, awake!" from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." After the stone had been lowered his Royal Highness examined it with the square, and then struck it with the mallet, after which he said, "I declare this stone to be well and duly laid," a fact which was immediately announced by a second salute of twenty-one guns fired by the Royal Engineer Train. His Royal Highness afterwards inspected the Corps of Royal Sappers, the troops marching past in slow and quick time, and executing a few other manœuvres. The Duke of Cambridge, before leaving the garrison, partook of luncheon in the messroom of the Royal Engineers, to which about 100 distinguished officers had been invited. On his Royal Highness leaving the garrison the guns from the battery fired a second salute. The officers of the Royal Engineers gave a grand banquet in their messroom the same evening in honour of the occasion, the band of the Engineers performing during the dinner.

The archway will serve as the gateway through which the troops will leave and enter the barracks on field days, and on some other occasions, and is so situated as to have one half in depth within and the other half without the existing boundary of the parade. The memorial will thus be as it should be, equally military and public. The whole of the sculpture will be executed by Mr. John Thomas, of the Adelphi-road, Regent's Park, whose beautiful works are already in a forward state. The panels on both fronts will be in white marble, on which will be sunk the inscriptions recording the name and rank of every officer and of every man in whose honour the memorial is to be erected.

The Duke, while at the same time severely classical one, has been selected by Mr. Digby Wyatt in order to prevent any jarring contrast with the architecture of the barrack buildings, the basis of the remembered, is probably the handsomest in the kingdom, and which presents an almost solitary instance of a noble building without any pretensions to regularity of style. It was built by Mr. James Wyatt, the Surveyor-General, and Mr. Digby Wyatt has endeavoured to make his leading lines assimilate with those laid down by his relative's adjacent work. The following are the leading dimensions of the memorial:—The entire width from end to end will be 64ft.; entire depth from side to side, 10 ft.; entire height of centre portion, 31ft.; height of sides, 17 ft.; width of centre archway, 12ft. 6 in.; height of centre archway, 22 ft.; width of side archways, 6ft. 3in.; height of side archways, 12 ft. 6 in. The whole will be executed, it is understood, in Portland stone, and will form, no doubt, the greatest, if not the only, "art-lion" at Chatham.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

ALTHOUGH the entries for some of the leading stakes were most fearfully clipped by the postponement, Lincoln had a capital meeting. The Derby, owing to his very backward condition, was beaten right away for the Trial Stakes; and Rupert, a son of Bolardo (who is now going to the Touchstone of the Newminster sire), the property of Lord Stamford's Lara, a 100-guinea purchase at the Royal sale, and four others, for the Brocklesby Stakes. Thirteen ran for the Grand Independent, which was kept in the county by Mr. S. Wellitt's The Emperor, a very good but somewhat uncertain-tempered horse, Athlete, a small mare of Lord Derby's, running second. The finest race of the meeting was for the Queen's Plate, between Newcastle and Tormentor; but the chestnut colt by Lanercost, by the aid of the first three-year-old victory was scored for the stock of Wild Dayrell, the sire of Buccaneer. At Liverpool, on the following Tuesday, October 4th, Mr. Ten Broeck's Lexington, the winner of the Cup; and Gaspard, who had been all the rage for the Chester Cup at 20 to 1 the day before The Cur, carrying 7st. 7lb., ridden by Eskdale, The Rover, and Jack Spring for the Trial Stakes. Lady Clifden, by Surplice, was quietly but firmly ridden out a foal, gave the fielders a good turn in the Tyro, where Mr. Merry's Dundee was all the rage, and made a fair beginning for Lord of the Isles. Nineteen went to the post for the Liverpool Steeplechase, which Anatis (against whom only 7 to 2 was laid at starting) won cleverly by half a length, Lady Coventry's mare broke down; but no horse broke his back. Brunette was about sixth, and beat her 12st. a mile and a half over the Aintree Hurdle Handicap gave the winner 20lb., and improved on his third place of last year.

Mr. Eastwood has published a letter in the Field in reply to the remarks which had been made about Tommy Noble being "milked" for the Yorkshire Handicap. He denies ever having backed a horse either he or his trainers, or any one connected with them, ever bet a shilling against the horse. In these days of organised touting there is no doubt but the layers know that the horse (which was last resident on the 12th ult.) had not been able to do his regular work, and operated accordingly; but still I shall not be induced to change my jump at once to the conclusion that Mr. Eastwood was a party to proceedings which no one else can help. We shall have to see a few more Bedfords, and Zetlands, and Towzeleys, and Eastwoods on the turf to make the rest go straight!

Steeplechasers have next week pretty nearly to themselves, with Birmingham on Monday and Tuesday; Bangor and Pembroke Annual on Thursday; and Chester on Thursday and Friday.

The sixpenny spring part of the Sunday Times Racing Record gives a pleasant prospect for March and April. The Lincoln will be the stakes closed for that month we have a list of jockeys as well as trainers. Alfred Day declares his lowest riding weight at 8st. 2lb., the same as Wells; while Fordham is 7 lb. 7lb., and Grimshaw 7st. 2lb. lower. John Osborne, who is engaged both to Lord Clifden and Baron Rothschild's, declares that, and he has had a pretty good run is to be brought out as a light weight for Fobett's stable at 6st. 7lb. It will be strange if riding is not less in vogue as it is so pleasant to see that well-remembered name, of Vollsgur, Feddington, and Faudango renown, in the jockey list once more. At the end of the list we think there are very valuable hints. In one colt which we find that in ten years the number of racehorses has increased from 218 to 1046. The wet summer of 1860 has made both the two and three-year-olds—312 on the former and 80 on the latter, while the first named improved above a slight fall in 1859.

As if to make up for the racing blank, next week will be a great one for coursing. Ashdown Park begins on Monday, and the Altear Club will make no strong forces with such as Mr. Lane Whatley's cracks. The Northern Counties Club is held on the same day; Cotswold begins on Tuesday, the Waterloo Cup on Wednesday, and County Louth Club and Limerick (Coleraine) on Wednesday and Thursday.

The remains of poor Robert Coombes, the ex-champion of the Thames, were laid in Brompton Cemetery last Wednesday, and many a distinguished brother of the oar and Kelly's Wherry Club-house, joined in the procession. The poor fellow was latterly in an asylum, and his mind had given way, and there can be little doubt his county Tyne" had triumphed on his own beloved Thames. Bob's the University crews are in active training for the 31st inst. Their weights are at present rather under par, and three Cambridge men average nearly 11st. 12lb. each.

The Oxford and two excellent runs on Monday, the first from Barkby Holt to Billesdon Coplow, where they killed. They then drew Scraptoft Park on Tuesday, but only for nineteen minutes, the pace most terrific. Melton Mowbray is very gay, and all on the qui vive for the amateur theatrical entertainments, which are to take place on the 22nd and 23rd, at the Corn Exchange. Ladies for Miss Craven, Grey de Wilton, and Alles and Catherine Egerton; are among the amateurs; and Captain Craven and Grey de Wilton, M.P., Hon. Seymour Egerton, Captain Hartop,*, and Messrs. R. B. Sheridan, Fry, &c., will also undertake parts. The room will accommodate 400 hundred, and a very large number of tickets are already purchased.

At a meeting of the inhabitants of Ivrell Vale it has been unanimously resolved to petition Parliament for the use of butter such that article shall be so reduced in price as to be within the reach of every one.

At a meeting of a few friends and admirers of the late Mr. Hallam recently held—the Marquis of Lansdowne in the chair—it was resolved that a memorial to Mr. Hallam should take the form of a historical literature of England, to raise a memorial to him. The names of the committee appointed to carry out the above object, and a list of the subscribers, will be announced shortly.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The continued unfavourable feeling between France, Sardinia, and Austria, in reference to the unsettled condition of the Italian difficulty, has had a serious influence upon the market for most National Stocks, in which the transactions have for some days been of a very limited character. The tone has fallen off considerably, and, has been trifling in the extreme; but, evidently, all parties are anxious to avoid any speculation at this time, and the public appear disposed to imitate their example.

The supply of capital in the London market is still very large. Although the demand for discount at the Bank has been tolerably active, the rates have ruled easy, and bill brokers are willing to take short paper at 2½ per cent. Good three-months' first-class short bills have been discounted at 2½; three months' bank bills, 2¾; and four to six months' do., 3 per cent.

Favourable advices have come to hand from Bombay stating that the Loans and Advances by the Bank of Bombay are up, and that an important rise has taken place in the value of rupee paper. Government Paper has risen to a high price accordingly. It is stated, however, that about £200,000 in silver will be forwarded to the East from this country, and that a further sum of £500,000 will be sent out. The whole of the gold to hand has been disposed of for shipment, and nearly £60,000 has been withdrawn from the Bank of England for that purpose. Spanish and Mexican dollars have realised 5s. 3¾d. per ounce. The amount of bullion withdrawn from the Bank of England is £1,000,000, which is now overdue.

The shareholders of the Royal Bank of Australia will shortly be returned them 5s per share. This, with previous payments, makes the return £50 per share, or 100 per cent upon the capital of the company. The Electric and International Telegraph Company have declared a dividend for the past six months at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, and Submarine Telegraph Shares of this company are about to raise £97,500 in new shares to extend their operations. The dividend of the Submarine Telegraph Company is at the rate of 10 per cent per annum.

About an average business has been passing in the shares of the newly-formed companies. Ocean Marine Insurance have sold at 2 3-16 to 3 pm.; General Steam Navigation, 1 to ½ pm.; Crystal Palace, 2 to 2 1-16 xd; 2 to 2 1-16 pm.; Buenos Ayres and San Fernando Railway, 7-16 to 9-16 pm.; Folkestone, 1 to 1 1-16 pm.; Hull and Selby, 1 to 1 1-16 pm.; Lancaster and Carlisle, 11 to 11¼; City of London Brewery Preference, ½ to ¾ pm.; and Anglo-American Telegraph, ¼ to ⅜ pm.

Sold, with full directions for use, in cases at 10s. 6d. and 21s.

As the first supply will be limited, an early application had better be made. Can be sent by post.

MR. ALEXANDER RUSSEL.

A FEW weeks ago our Journal contained a brief account of a presentation of plate, with 1600 sovereigns, to Mr. Russel, editor of the Scotsman, and we have now great pleasure in giving a Portrait of this deserving and unusually fortunate member of the Fourth Estate.

Mr. Russel was born in Edinburgh on the 10th of December, 1814, and was educated in his native city. His calling was originally intended to have been that of a printer; but as he approached manhood he changed his views, and, after contributing to Tait's Magazine and other periodicals of the day, he became, in 1839, the editor of the Berwick Advertiser. Having occupied that position for three years, he took charge of the Fife Herald, which he continued to be till 1846, when he started a Liberal paper in Kilmarnock. In the beginning of 1844, however, Mr. Russel became connected with the Scotsman as assistant to Mr. Maclaren, then editor of that Journal. Mr. Maclaren, finding his place so well supplied, and after a long and successful career as an editor, resigned, and Mr. Russel was chosen as his successor. Besides his able conduct of the Scotsman Mr. Russel has contributed valuable articles to the Edinburgh Review, the Quarterly Review, the Encyclopædia Britannica, Blackwood's Magazine, and other publications.

The testimonials already referred to, which were presented to Mr. Russel by a large number of the leaders of the Liberal party of Edinburgh, consist of an elegant and massive silver salver, a silver claret-jug, a timepiece in gold (the whole of which articles were supplied by Mackay and Cunningham, of Edinburgh), a purse containing 1600 sovereigns, and an emblazoned roll of the subscribers, numbering about four hundred and fifty, and including among them many of the most celebrated men of the day. The object of the presentation is best explained by the inscription on the salver, which is as follows:—"Presented, with 1600 sovereigns, to Alexander Russel, Esq., editor of the Scotsman, in recognition of his able and consistent advocacy of enlightened political principles, and as a mark of respect for his honourable and independent conduct in public and private life, 1860." This tribute has been well earned, and, we believe, has been bestowed with a hearty appreciation of the deserving qualities of Mr. Russel as an editor, an able writer, and an honest man.

VOLUNTEER FORCE, MONTREAL, CANADA.

THE Montreal Volunteer Brigade, organised under the Militia Act of 1855, consists at present of a Commandant, Brigade Major, and Aide-de-Camp; a squadron of cavalry, eleven officers, and 100 sabres; a field battery of artillery, four guns, seven officers, and sixty men; a company of foot artillery, three officers, and fifty men; two companies of the battalion Montreal Artillery, ten officers, and eighty-six men; a battalion of Rifles, consisting of nine companies, thirty-nine officers, and 500 men; a battalion of Light Infantry, officered, but not yet embodied: making a total of seventy-three officers and 796 men, uniformed as shown in the annexed Engraving. This fine brigade is now in the most efficient state, and has on various occasions co-operated with her Majesty's troops in the field. On the Queen's birthday it invariably parades with them. The late gallant Sir William Eyre, when Commander of the Forces in Canada, took the warmest interest in the force; and on one occasion, that of a sham fight on the St. Lawrence with the troops in the garrison, complimented it by a flattering general order for the efficient manner in which it took part in the evolutions of the day. It was lately reviewed and inspected by the hero of Kars, who expressed his appreciation of its general appearance and steadiness under arms. The brigade is now looking forward to having the honour of providing his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales with the suitable escorts and guards of honour due to his rank during his stay in Montreal on his visit to Canada the coming summer.

EXPERIMENTS WITH WHITWORTH'S RIFLED CANNON AT SOUTHPORT.

So much has been said and written upon the astonishing results obtained from Mr. Whitworth's cannon in his late experiments that it will be unnecessary to do more than give a general account of what took place at Southport. Mr. Whitworth's experiments were made on the seashore between Southport and Liverpool. By the permission of the Admiralty he availed himself of some six or seven miles of flat seashore, admirably adapted for testing the range of his guns, but not equally suited for target practice at long distances. The targets placed on the flat shore cannot be distinguished so as to enable them to be sighted at the great ranges to which the Whitworth cannon throws its shot. An eminence similar to that from which the cannon are fired at the Shoeburyness range is requisite.

The experiments were made on five different days, between the 16th and 24th ult. Southport, which is one of the most frequented of the Lancashire watering-places, roused itself from its winter lethargy to witness the success of the great Lancashire engineer and artillerymen. Crowds of visitors streamed along the flat shores, or climbed the sandy hillocks which fringe the low coast and form a natural dyke against the incursions of the sea.

A small, open space on the shore, about two miles and a half from Southport, was marked out by cords and posts to restrain the press of the spectators, who were, moreover, duly kept in order by the inevitable police. In this space stood four Whitworth breech-loading guns, mounted on their carriages. Two were 3-pounders, one was a 12-pounder, and one an 80-pounder. An 18-pounder was also on the sands, but it was not fired, as so much time was taken up by the experiments with the other guns.

We give in tables, which follow, the best results obtained in each, and certainly they merit the appellation of "astounding" bestowed upon them by a leading morning paper. The smallest gun, a 3-pounder, weighing only 208lb., threw a shot upwards of five miles and a half, and achieved more in point of range than any gun of any calibre that had before been tried, not excepting any made by Sir William Armstrong. He, on one occasion, succeeded in throwing a 32lb. shot five miles and 350 yards, a range which neither he himself nor any one else exceeded until it was far surpassed by Mr. Whitworth.

It has since been said that precision, rather than range, was chiefly aimed at by Sir William Armstrong. It would seem likely, however, that the gun that was able to give to shot the best impetus for flight would also give it the truest impetus for precision. The statement, however, had the high authority of Mr. Sidney Herbert, who supported it in the House of Commons. Why what must be taken to be bestresults in precision obtained by Sir W. Armstrong, in the way of forty shots fired with the Armstrong 12-pounder, Mr. Herbert gave the results of 15, fired respectively at elevations of 7, 8, and 9 degrees. And here we may contrast the mode, so often adopted in recording artillery practice, of giving the results of selected shots, with that adopted in recording the experiments at Southport. In the case of every shot that has as yet been fired, and published, without any suppression or allowance for trial or wild shots, and without any selection of a favourable percentage of the hits made. This enables any one acquainted with the subject, even though not present at the experiments, to deduce correct conclusions from them. But to return to the account of the Armstrong 12-pounder, which it will be interesting to compare with the Whitworth 12-pounder, as to precision of fire as well as range. We quote Mr. Herbert's speech made in the House on Friday, July 27:—"On the last gun made by Sir William Armstrong, and sent to be tried, was a 12-pounder. At 7 degrees of elevation, in five rounds, the range was from 2465 to 2495 yards, the difference in the range being 30 yards, and the greatest deviation 8 yards either way." With these may be compared the practice with a Whitworth of the same calibre (12-pounder), at the same elevation (7 deg.), on Feb. 21, as appears from the table below. The range was from 3072 yards to 3107 yards, the difference in range being 29 yards, the greatest deviation in width, 3 2-9ths yard.

The range of the Whitworth at 7 deg. (3107 yards) exceeded the range of the 7 deg. range (2495 yards) of the Armstrong by 612 yards, exceeded the range obtained by the latter gun at 8 deg., and even 9 deg., and was therefore not fired at 8 deg. or 9 deg.

The shooting of the Whitworth 80-pounder at 7 deg. appears to have been still more accurate: the range attained was about 4000 yards, and the whole out of four shots fell in a space of sixteen yards long, by one foot wide. This comparison at 7 deg. is sufficient to show that in precision, as well as in range, the Whitworth has proved itself the superior gun.

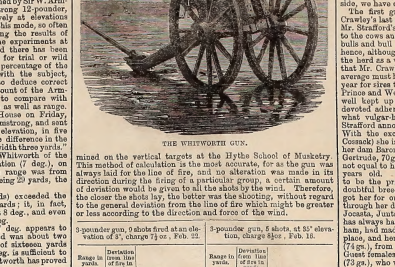
Objections have been made to the Whitworth cannon on the score that it does not fire shell; but if, as Mr. Whitworth states, it is capable of such shot, and still better for shell, and hollow shot filled with explosive, the objection is merely technical. He also states that his guns are actually stronger than they are practically required to be, and may be fired with greater charges of powder with the largest charge of powder that they can consume. This was strikingly illustrated by the practice of the 3-pounder at Southport, when it was, with its carriage, elevated to 45 degrees and fired like a mortar at 35 deg. without injuring it in any way. This must be ascribed to the fact that the rotary motion of the projectile—cylly-lilling projectiles from the polygonal bore is reduced to its minimum. The principle is precisely that by which the breech-loading rifle is propelled through the smooth, well-lubricated tube, and, as provision is made for keeping it as it issues from the muzzle in the line of fire, it is found to have the same precision and accuracy in range and precision, and also as to recoil. The bore, as well known, is a spiral hexagon, with rounded corners being rounded off. The pitch of the rifling, or the turn, is a rapid one.

The 3-pounder is 70 inches long, and, with a bore of 1¼ inch, has one turn in 40 inches, and weighs only 208lb. The 12-pounder, with a bore of 2 inches, has one turn in 60 inches. The 80-pounder, with a bore of 5·4 inches, has one turn in 100 inches. The quick turn and rotation of bore are considered as the principal features in the Whitworth system, both for rifled cannon and the rifled musket.

All the cannon fired at Southport are breech-loaders. The breech end of the gun is closed when charged by a cap, screwed on somewhat like a magnified top of a lucifer-match canister, being of larger proportions, it is turned by a handle. The cap is not detached, but works in a loop, which is connected by a hinge-joint to the breech of the gun.

The method of charging and working the gun is as follows:—Five or six turns of the handle unscrew the breech-cap, which is received and supported in a loop, and is then swung back, or rather on one side, like an opened door, leaving the breech end of the gun exposed. The projectile is then pushed in, and behind it is inserted a tin cartridge-case, containing the powder, and shaped lanagrumly to fit the rifled bore. The powder is put in the cartridge-case by a wad or hexagonal cake of lubricating material, such as a mixture of wax and tallow. In the rear end of the case is a small orifice corresponding with the vent, which is made in the end of the breech-cap. On the latter being closed and screwed, the hinged loop carrying the breech-cap is swung to its door fashion, and by turning the handle it is screwed firmly on the rear of the gun. An ordinary friction tube is then inserted in the vent, and, as stated, in the centre of the breech-cap, and the piece is discharged precisely in less than a minute from the time of beginning to load, and that without any attempt at hurry. When the piece is discharged there is no escape of gases from the breech; and when it is unscrewed and swung aside the end of the tin cartridge-case is seized by hand, or by a suitable gripping instrument, and is withdrawn from the gun. The case is then ready for another charge. The loading depots, and, as the barrel is completely lubricated by the lubricating wad, no sponging nor cleansing by water is required; in fact, the shots, as they issue, clean the gun.

Next to the gun itself, the tin cartridge-case, whose convenience and utility were strikingly manifested, was admired. Its closeness for storage and superiority over the old flannel bag were universally acknowledged.



It should be mentioned that, at different times during the continuance of the experiments, many military officers and others rank in our own and foreign services, who acknowledged authority in matters relating to artillery, were present.

Among the guns ranged round the gun in our illustration are represented Sir John Burgoyne, over zealous on behalf of the service; the Hon. Captain Wrottesley; Colonel Campbell, who represented the Ordnance Select Committee; and Mr. Whitworth himself. Among the various foreign Governments who were represented we may mention the Russian, Danish, Swedish, Austrian, Swiss, and others, we are informed, who did not declare themselves.

The military men and engineers, who attended in strong force to witness the Southport experiments, were as much pleased as surprised by the extreme simplicity of the breech-loading arrangements, and the ease and certainty with which the guns were worked. It is worthy of remark that, through all the days' experiments, there was no instance of any delay caused by difficulty in loading, or by fouling, or firing the breech, or any accident in the working of any of the guns. The experiments were consequently very interesting. The shots were fired in groups, of various numbers. The place where each shot fell was marked by a peg, and afterwards carefully measured and recorded.

The same of the reported accounts the ranges are tabulated in decreasing or in increasing order, so that the reader or observer gives no indication of the actual order of firing, of which no account was kept, as all the shots were measured at the end of the experiment to prevent loss of time.

Our space will not admit of our giving tables of all the experiments made; we have, therefore, chosen those which give the best and most interesting results, and which specially enable a comparison to be made between the Whitworth and Armstrong guns. We have in each table given the distance of every shot fired in the series or group forming the particular experiment. In some cases average distances are calculated from the ascertained centre of the group of shots fired, and are taken longitudinally and laterally. This is, in fact, applying to the horizontal area in which the shots fell the same principles on which the "figure of merit" is determined on the vertical targets at the Hythe School of Musketry. This method of calculation is the most accurate, for as the gun may always laid for the line of fire, and no alteration was made in its direction during the firing of a particular group, a certain amount of deviation would be given to all the shots by the wind. Therefore the closer the shots lay, the better was the shooting, without regard to the general deviation from the line of fire which might be greater or less according to the direction and force of the wind.

If three out of the four shots be taken, the greatest difference in range is sixteen yards, while the greatest difference in width is only one foot! Calculating the mean of deviation from the centre, it is only four inches, a precision about equal to that of the Whitworth rifle musket when shot under most favourable conditions at one-seventh of the range of the cannon—that is, at 600 yards. A challenge to result in another way, three out of four of the shots would have struck in an area sixteen yards long, and one foot wide, with a range of about two miles, and would have gone through a target not a yard high and only one foot wide!

THE ULTIMATUM OF FRANCE TO SARDINIA.

The Moniteur of Saturday last contained a message from M. Thouvenel, dated Feb. 28, addressed to Baron Talleyrand, the French Ambassador at Turin.

The Minister states the grave situation which has been created by the late events, and explains the dangers which would be incurred by Europe in ever-extending her territory. M. Thouvenel says:—The idea of annexation to Piedmont is rather a present against another power than a deliberate attraction towards Sardinia. If this feeling did not appear from the beginning it would not long delay to do so, and the progress which Victor Emmanuel's kingdom would make would be a permanent menace to Europe. The Emperor would not only support this combination in a conference or Congress, but also would see in it a real danger. Such an extension shall be allowed to attack it. The Cabinet of Turin is at liberty to accept or refuse the offer of Lombardy, but it cannot refuse to accept the responsibility of such a state of things. M. Thouvenel then treats the question of neutrality for the cantons of Savoy, which, without the establishment of Sardinia, presents itself as a geographical accident. He supposes the case of Switzerland called to relieving herself of his moral responsibility under the principle of neutrality. Then which could be the power to which Europe would entrust the foundation of the new order of things in Italy, but this England of which Lord John Russell's copy of the despatch which has been forwarded to Turin.

AUDACIOUS ROBBERY.—The cabinet of the King of the Belgians in the Palace at Brussels was entered on Monday week, and two paintings by Verboeckhoven, and a clock, including the dials and the seasons, were stolen. To carry off the pictures easily the thief removed them from the frames. The clock, which, it is said, was a present from Queen Victoria, was highly prized by his Majesty. The police were immediately set on foot, and discovered that the clock had been pawned; but of the thief and the pictures they have thus far obtained no trace.

THE FARM.

THE late night frosts have told sadly upon the wheat, and the sun by day has tended to double the mischief. Farmers live on in the hope that spring will come with a rush, as they are having hard work, with chaff, oat clover, meal, and other devices for their sheep, to fill up the vacuum between rotten turnips and long-delayed grass. The usual drying winds are also wanted, but only for the soil and the condition of the newly-thrashed wheat. Markets have, therefore, kept stationary, though, where small supplies have come to hand with drier samples, there has been a more ready demand. As compared with this time last year, wheat, by last Friday week's Gazette, was 4s. higher; barley, 3s. 6d.; and rye, 4s. 9d.; while oats, per contra side, we have oats 1d. less; beans, 3s. 3d.; and peas, 4s. 8d.

The first great Shorthorn sale of the year took place at Mr. Crawley's last week, and fifty-eight lots averaged £46 4d., under Mr. Strafford's glass. Of this average £53 12s. must be apportioned to the cows and heifers, and £39 8s. to the bulls, as due to the bulls and bull calves. There was no very distinguishing tribe; and hence, although the cows and heifers had very telling pedigrees, with the bard as a whole lacked character. It is a source of much regret that Mr. Crawley has given up his son early in the day, and the good average must have shewn him that his spirit in buying at £500 a year for sires to the crack breeders was duly appreciated. The British Prince and Windermere Comet bulls were the best of the day, and well kept up the fame of Warlaby. Mr. Carr, one of the most devoted of the Scotch admirers of Booth pastures, took the somewhat vulgar-headed Barmaid by the former for 100gs.; and Mr. Strafford announced then he had received nearly 20 letters about her. With the exception of the Claramont cross (and his Duke of Scots's Cousack) she is, we believe, pure Booth; and Mr. Carr also bought her dam Baroness, a daughter of Lancaster Calmady, for half the sum. Gertrude, 70gs., was another worthy daughter of British Prince, but not equal to her dam. Jessie, a dark roan, and still under three years old. Hair and general elegance justly entitled her to be the prima donna of the day. Unfortunately she is a doubtful breeder; but for that Mr. Beasley would not have got her for only 81gs. She is one of his "J sort," running back through her dam to Jessamine. Of the 12 cows (26gs.), to Amanda, Jocasta, Justa, Joyance, Javelin, &c., for which Chapel Brampton was always famous, Mr. Carr took two. There was such a bulls at Colwinston, had made no great advance since she left the Welsh hillplace, and hence she fetched 29gs. less in March last. Mistletoe (74gs.), from a dam by Mr. Bates's Duke of the Isles out of Alcazar Guest females, and he also did himself no little credit with Ortolan (72gs.), who was got by Mr. Crawley's bull out of a cow sent to improve "the Estes calves." Pilgrese, a five months' heifer calf, by First Fruits, made 45gs.; and Sweetheart, who was barely three months, and a combination of British Prince and First Fruits, found, we believe, a new home at Killerby. The farm buildings on the estate form a model, and are well suited for feeding cattle in a large way, with its contrivances for wheeling food in by a tramroad and taking the manure away by the same means to the middens.

Colonel Towneley's Fidelity has had a fine bull calf by Royal Butterfly, and Mr. Ambler has sold his Prince Alfred, by Booth's Lord of the Valley from Mr. Bolden's Lady Caroline, near Chorley Norton. The lovers of Leicesters will be sorry to hear that Mr. Sandby's G.N., the third shearling ram purchased by him at Warwick, and supposed to be one of the finest Leicesters ever exhibited, had to be killed last week. Mr. Sandby used him four seasons and only showed him once, and considers that he was the equal, as an opinion in which several of the best judges bear him out. He had sunk very much, owing to a tumour having grown on the side of the head, completely filled with sand. A cure for mucous cases has perhaps never been known.

THE NEW REFORM BILL

The bill brought in by Lord John Russell further to amend the laws relating to the representation of the people in England and Wales was issued last Saturday. It consists of twenty-five clauses and one short schedule.

The first clause confers the right of voting in counties upon occupiers of houses or other buildings duly assessed to the poor-rate, and occupied therewith as owner or as tenant under the same landlord, of the clear yearly value of not less than £10. The annual registration under the Act of 1832 is duly required to be made.

Clause 2 enacts that the qualifications now in force as to time of occupation, rating, claiming to be rated, payment of rates, and as to successive and joint occupation, shall continue to be the rule for the exercise of the county franchise.

In clause 3 it is provided that the yearly value of premises occupied giving a right to vote is to be as instead of £10.

Clause 4 enacts that the occupation of a building, other than a dwelling-house jointly with land, is not to confer a right of voting, unless the building be of the yearly value of £10 over and above the buildings.

Clause 5 sets forth that sections 24 and 25 of the Reform Act of 1832 shall not be applicable to the right to vote in the city of London as away by the previous section. Those two sections disentitle the persons mentioned in them to vote in respect of the occupation of the shops, or other estates, or buildings, or occupation, as described in the former Act.

Clause 6 regulates the circumstances under which the county takes by occupiers previous to registration.

Clauses 7 and 8 make certain schedules taking away one member from each of twenty-five places now returning two, and distributing these members to other boroughs and counties.

Clause 14 recounts the qualification of electors for the member allotted to London University. The Masters of Arts, Bachelors of Arts, Doctors of Laws, Bachelors of Medicine of the University, and Bachelors of Arts of three years' standing, are to have a right to vote.

The remaining clauses, to the number of sixteen, refer to the details of arrangements for registration, voting, &c.

The following are the schedules referred to in the bill:—

SCHEDULE A.—Boroughs and places returning one member which are to return in future Parliaments one member each:—Guildford, Hertford, Devizes, Ludlow, Dunbarton, Haverfordwest, Montgomery, Cardigan, Aldeburgh, Bipon, Maldon, Tewkesbury, Knaresborough, Andover, Ludlow, Lymington, Leominster, Malmesbury, Marlborough, Ross, Totnes, Truro, Totnes, Thetford, Honiton.

SCHEDULE B.—Counties to be boroughs to return one member each:—Birkenhead (Cheshire); Burnley (Lancashire); Stalybridge (Cheshire and Lancashire).

SCHEDULE C.—County, riding, parts, and divisions of counties, now returning two members, which are to return three members each:—Lincolnshire, Parts of Lindsey; Lincolnshire, Parts of Holland; Yorkshire, West Riding; Lancashire, Parts of Southern Division; Lancashire, Eastern Division; Norfolk, Western Division; Cornwall, Western Division; Essex, Northern Division.

SCHEDULE D.—Boroughs now returning two members which are to return in future Parliaments three members each:—Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Leeds.

DESCRIPTION OF THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY SEPULCHRE.—A letter from Jerusalem furnishes us with the following details:—Outside a narrow street, so people go to and fro, talk aloud, and sometimes quarrel; inside you enter a large square court, paved with large stones; and ragged and dirty mendicants of all nations and both sexes group themselves on the hills above the steps, and display stumps of limbs and clamorously beg. But what even more than these scenes offends the Christian is, that in the vaguest alcove of the court, and on the steps which lead up to the church above, covered with carpets and cushions, lounging Mussulmans smoking pipes and drinking coffee. Right in front of the steps, it is said, are the large fragments of the dome of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, which was overthrown in an earthquake. It is to be regretted that it was not about one-half of the dome admits rain. In fact, when the rain is heavy the pavement of the court is covered.

FRANCE AND SAVOY.—The diplomatic correspondence on the subject of Savoy was laid before Parliament yesterday week. The first document is from Lord John Russell to Sir Henry Bulwer, dated March 1, 1859. In a letter dated February 15, 1860, addressed by Lord John Russell to Earl Cowley, the former states that Lord Derby's Government had declared at the 8th from M. Thouvenel, his Lordship thus communicated to Count Walewski the security of France, a country which, occupying her colonies, can be possessing 36,000,000 of inhabitants, without commanding her Majesty's the contradiction to the language of the proclamation that it is only very lately French before and during the war in Italy, and that it is the annexation has appeared in the light of a probable arrangement. It is only of late, therefore, that it has been thought necessary by her Majesty's Government to state their serious objections to the project of transferring Savoy and Nice to France. Her Majesty's Government cannot conceive why, in the event of France, a country which, so populous, and so military, that the security of France, a country which, occupying her colonies, can be endangered by the existence, on the other side of the Alps, of a State of 11,000,000 of people, lately joined by a cement not yet dry, thousand, 11,000,000 of people, lately joined by a cement not yet dry, thousand, on the side of Lombardy, by Austria, and not very certain of its own independence.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

It has been matter of observation before, but the last few days have confirmed a notion which has been entertained by the regular lookers-on, that there has been a great deal of admirable Parliamentary speaking this Session. In most recent instances the inspiration has been caught from the subject of the annexation of Savoy to France, on which there have been three brief debates in the last ten days, in which almost the same speakers have taken part. In the second of these discussions the matter was going quietly enough, when Mr. Bright, who seems, not unnaturally, painfully impatient of anything which at this moment is calculated to give a pretext for offence to the Emperor of the French, interposed, and, truth to say, did make an insinuation and deliver himself of a sneer (which he seldom loses an opportunity of doing) at the landed interest which justified the choking passion of Lord John Manners, who, in his reply, rose to a pitch of indignation, which forced his retorts up to an eloquence of a mixed character, his phraseology being at once coarse and elevated. The occasion roused even Mr. Monckton Milnes into a high strain of utterance; and, in short, the subject seems to act like electricity, or rather like the match applied to a series of fireworks, upon every one who approaches it, except—most notable exception—Lord Palmerston, who sits calm, silent, and motionless, when, of all things in the world, foreign affairs are rattling and cracking around him, as if, in fact, he was not the very type of that functionary who, in the mysteries of Isis, inspired the oracles and directed the juggling from the inner and stiller depths of the occult paraphernalia. Then, again, on Monday, how Mr. Kinglake rose into power and impressiveness when he rung out his protest against accepting the commercial treaty with France before the House had expressed its opinion on the Imperial policy with regard to Savoy, and how fast and flashing were the lightnings of Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald's indignant denunciations against the calm acquiescence of England in that policy, by which he proved that he has in him the power to sustain the reputation which he awakened one morning and found himself possessed of simultaneously with his accession to office. No wonder that such a stimulus should again work Mr. Bright into one of those white heats which indicate the powerful struggle that must continually be going on between his natural man and his pacific principles. His was on this occasion a fine specimen of the oratory of denunciation under the guise of entreaty and appeal. There was something comic in the interposition of Mr. Liddell—not that that gentleman was in the least jocose, but was, in fact, as angrily indignant as any one; but he stood between a burst from Mr. Whiteside on Mr. Bright which the former was actually on his legs to deliver, and which must have evaporated in the few moments of Mr. Liddell's intervention; for when Mr. Whiteside rose again he appeared in the novel character of a gentle and placatory genius in the midst of as troubled and exciting a tongue-contest as could well have been. It is necessary, in a certain sense, to refer to the part taken by Mr. Roebuck in this discussion; and, on consideration of the tone adopted by him, it seems to be the best course to pass it over, only saying that doubtless there was hardly one of those who heard him who did not accept with eagerness his statement that he did not belong to, and therefore could not be considered as the representative of, any party whatever in Parliament, and perhaps, it may be added, in the country.

One very noticeable circumstance connected with this particular debate was the line taken by Lord Palmerston. It may be recollected that in this Journal, and in more than one place in it, attention has been directed to the mode in which the Government had borne their recent triumphs, and it was pointed out that there was a strong tendency on the part both of Lord Palmerston and Mr. Gladstone to treat the House with something like haughtiness, and certainly with a want of due consideration. Now, we are happy to say that a marked change has taken place in this respect. It was hardly to be supposed that such an experienced Parliamentary tactician as Lord Palmerston, who during his present tenure of office has the advantage which he did not possess in his former premiership of having every department efficiently represented in the House of Commons, and thus is able to perform the duties of leadership in silent watchfulness, should not have observed the growing temper of the House. In 1857-58, having to do everything, to stand in the van, and to meet every encounter in his own person, to answer every question, and to reply to every speech of consequence, he necessarily lost sight of those less patent symptoms which mark the condition of the mind of the House of Commons, and, in the excitement of single combat, he forgot the duties of generalship. Now his business is to see how things are going, and he has stopped the course which things were taking to which we have alluded; and in all others, and especially in the instance of his readiness to postpone Mr. Byng's motion of approval of the commercial treaty the moment that he saw the House wished it, he has proved that he does not intend a second time to peril his tenure of office by want of personal management. Then, too, over Mr. Gladstone has come a still more decided change. He seems to have awakened to a sense of the danger to which he was exposing his undoubted influence and his almost magic power over the House by impatience of opposition and fretfulness of demeanour, which had grown to a height which was really alarming. Now nothing can be better than the mixture of firmness and deference with which he deals with the House. He has forgone that eagerness to answer everybody who spoke, on the moment and at every moment, which characterised his conduct a few days since. Besides this, there are indications of his having seen the wisdom of managing—we will not say manœuvring, although that is the word which expresses our meaning, if it is used in the more immediate and technical, and not in its lowest, sense—the details of his Budget, instead of driving it headlong and wholesale on like an escaped locomotive engine. This must be satisfactory to every one who is interested in matters Parliamentary, because it gives an earnest that there is no chance of any interruption to the Session, which might have happened if the Government had contrived by their shortsightedness and want of skill to irritate the House, and caused it to make a set upon the Ministry from a personal point of view.

There can hardly be a better proof of the impression which the Reform Bill has made on the minds even of those whose tendencies or avocations are connected with Parliament than the fact that this present chronicler, an assiduous devotee in such matters, and who is always taking notes of the doings in the Legislature, very nearly forgot all about it in this a professed record of Parliamentary specialties. Well, the sin of omission or forgetfulness is one for which much precedent might have been gathered from the Thursday of last week about half-past four o'clock. There was hardly a sign or a symptom or the casting of a shadow of a great coming event. In the first place, the lobbies were unstirred by the tumult of an expected important debate or the deliverance of a great Ministerial proposition. Inside the House, the cards which members who attend at prayers place over the seats they have selected were unusually sparse and infrequent; there was a quietude about the preliminary proceedings positively unaccustomed; and, most striking and most remarkable of all, the Strangers' Gallery, in all its divisions, was anything but oppressed with panting listeners and eager observers. The Treasury bench, before and even during the exposition of the Government plan, was thin; and although, when Lord John Russell actually got on his legs, there was a well-filled, it was by no means what is to be called a crowded, House. There was not an approach to that cramming which is indispensable in that moderate-sized and somewhat inconvenient chamber when, say, five hundred members simultaneously exercise their right to be present there. Lord John partook of the general coldness which prevailed. He began with an air of listlessness, and an evident desire to prepare the House for the absence of anything to excite the most temporary emotions, far less to stir the depths of alarm. Even when he introduced his chartered allusions to the Constitution of Great Britain, and his stereotyped homage to Mr. Burke, he was still unmoved; and the only time when he evinced a sympathy was when he spoke—slight as the reference was—of Macaulay. It was clear that, looking to the notice-paper, which contained an intimation that the Reform Bills for Scotland and Ireland would be introduced on the same evening, and remembering that Mr. Gladstone had stated his belief that he should be able to get on to his Budget resolutions at a reasonable hour on the same evening, a fair judgment of the extent of the measures to be proposed, and of the length of time they would occupy, was easily formed beforehand. Accordingly Lord John spoke for just an hour, Mr. Cardwell and the Lord Advocate occupied a quarter of an hour and ten minutes respectively, and after all the discussion which the Irish and Scotch measures elicited, and in which the Scotch members were for once more troublesome and pertinacious than gentlemen from Ireland, a very thin House at nine o'clock had disposed of the Ministerial schemes of the Government, and subsided into the consideration of almonds, sweet and bitter, the butter, cheese, and nux vomica of the tariff.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

S. Martin, Weymouth.—Even if the error in recording the last two moves entailed a penalty on White, which it could not, as those moves were made over the board, his adversary had no right to exact it after resigning the game. See rule X. in "Chess Praxis"—"A penalty can only be enforced before the adversary has touched a man in reply."

A Member of the Deptford Chess Club.—A very clever stratagem.

H. A. Nisbett.—It admits of an easy solution in three moves, beginning 1. R to K Kt 7th.

W. T. P.—A pretty conception; but there is another and very obvious solution:—1. Q to K B 6th (ch); 2. Q to Q 6th (ch), and mate next move.

Black Knight.—Correct, but too simple.

C. W., of Sunbury.—No. 1 is neat and ingenious. No. 2 is correct, but hardly difficult enough. No. 3 is clever; and No. 4 allows of a second solution, by 1. Q to Q 5th; 2. Kt to Q B 5th (ch), and mate next move.

R. M. C.—True; if Black had played 10. Q to Q 2nd he would have sustained no loss.

W. B. Fraser.—They shall be reported on, probably in our next.

I. F. R.—The game by correspondence between Greenwich and Deptford is under examination.

I. H.—1. Such a contest was talked of, but the professional engagements of the English amateur precluded his playing a set match. 2. It is impossible to decide upon present evidence.

C. W. Clulow.—The position is not at hand, but it shall be examined.

A. de R., Paris.—Received with thanks.

L. M.—Apply to the secretary of the St. George's Club, 20, King-street, St. James's.

Bradford and Settle Chess Clubs.—The return match between these clubs was played at Bradford a few days since, and the Settle Club was again victorious—on this occasion by a majority of two games.

 The Birmingham and Edgbaston Chess Club are desirous of engaging in a Match at chess with another club. Apply to W. Wills, Esq., Waterloo-street, Birmingham.
